Pope Adrian dying in 1159, the Election of a new Pope occasioned a Schism, which long divided Christendom. The Majority of the Cardinals elected Roland a Native of Siena, who took the Name of Alexander III. The rest chose Cardinal Octavian, who filled himfelf 1159 for Pope. Almost all the Christian Princes owned Alexander for Pope. But the German espoused the Cause of Victor, who finding himself supported by the Emperor Barloeffa, drove his Rival out of Rome, and forced him to seek for Shelter in France.

For the Charge of the War, he raised a Scutage, which amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand Pounds. At this Siege did Henry, Son of the Earl of Gloucester, GOUGH, p. 1331.

1162. The last Peace between the Kings of France and England, was only, as hath been said, a Confirmation of the Treaty of Paris; wherein a Marriage between Henry's eldest Son and Margaret, Daughter of Lewis was agreed upon. The Princess was to have for her Dowry the City of Gisors, and part of the Vexin, which, for that Purpose, were to remain in the Custody of the Knights Templars (1), till the Marriage was solemnized. Pursuant to this Treaty, Chancellor Becket was sent to Paris with a magnificent Retinue, to demand the young Princess, who was to be educated in England till she became marriageable. Shortly after her Arrival at London (2), Henry ordered the Nuptials to be celebrated, though the Bridegroom was but seven, and the Bride but three, Years old. Upon which the Knights Templars, thinking he had sufficiently performed his Promise, put him in possession of Gisors. This Precipitation occasioned the renewal of the War between the two Kings. Lewis complained that the King of England had bribed the Grand Master of the Temple. Henry maintained, that, having performed his part of the Treaty, he had not injured the King of France in taking possession of Gisors. This War, which lasted but a very little while, was ended by the Mediation of Alexander III, lately arrived in France. His Legates, who were sent before, preparing the way for an Accommodation, the two Kings went together to receive the Pope at Tury upon the Loire. When they came near him, they both alighted, and, each taking hold of a Rein of his Bridle, conducted him to the Lodgings prepared for him.

All these Events, namely, the Conquest of Navarre, the Siege of Toulouse, the Marriage of Prince Henry, and the War with France passed between the Years 1159, and 1163. I have suspended my Judgment upon the particular Dates of each, by reason of the Diversity among Historians on that Head. Upon this Account perhaps it is, that a famous Modern has comprised all these Particulars within the Compass of eight or nine Lines.

After settling the Affairs which detained him in France four years, Henry returned into England in 1163. His present Condition gave him room to hope nothing could disturb his Happiness. He had just made a Peace with France, which probably, would be lasting. The Welsh remained quiet in their own Country. The King of Scotland had given a sensible Proof of his desire to live in Peace, by restoring all the Places that might have occasioned a War. On the other hand, England was in a profound Tranquillity, the Normans and English being equally satisfied with the Sovereign. In this so quiet a Situation, Henry thought he might congratulate himself upon his Happiness, when on a sudden the Pride and Obstinacy of one of his Subjects raised a Storm, the allaying of which cost him a thousand Vexations, with the loss of his Honour: I mean Thomas Becket. He was Son of a Citizen of London (3) by a Syrian Woman (4), and spent his Youth in the Study of the Law. He grew so famous at the Bar, that he was taken from thence, and made Archdeacon of Canterbury (5). In the beginning of this Reign he had certain Affairs to manage at Court, which gave him opportunity of making himself known to the King, and gaining his Esteem and Good-will. Henry conceiving a great opinion of his Merit, quickly gave him a sensible Mark of his Esteem, by conferring on him the Dignity of High-Chancellor (6). In the discharge of this eminent Office, Becket behaved to all the World with so much Pride and Haughtiness, as rendered him extremely troublesome to his Equals, and insupportable to his Inferiors. Above all things, he was a lover of Pageantry and Show (7). He is said in the War of Toulouse, where he attended the King, to maintain at his own Expence, seven hundred Knights, and twelve hundred Foot. But if he was haughty to all others, he was not so with regard to the King. Upon all occasions he shewed himself so entirely devoted to his Will, that the King, considered him as one always ready to sacrifice every thing to his Service. Whilst he was thus prepossessed in his Favour, he received the News, in Normandy, of the Death of Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury. This appearing to him a favorable Juncture to execute certain premeditated Designs, he resolved to procure the Archbishoprick for Becket, as a Person who might be very serviceable to him. How little Inclination forever the Monks of St. Augustin's had for Becket, whom they thought too much a Courtier, the King's Recommendation was so urgent in his behalf, that he was elected and consecrated a little before that Prince's Return (8). As soon as he saw himself fixed in that high Station, he sent the Great Seal to his Benefactor, who little expected it; and suddenly altering his manner of Living, he wore a Monk's Habit with Sackcloth next his Skin, and kept only a few Domestic Servants clothed very plain. By these and several other Things of like Nature, he shewed, that he was resolved thoroughly to reform his Life, or had some great design in his Head. It was some time before his Intentions could be discovered, till at length, it was perceived, that on all occasions he was aspiring to an Independent Power.

I have already remarked in several Places, how much the Power of the Clergy was increased to the Prejudice of the Royal Authority. Henry, who had seen very bad Effects of it in the Reign of Stephen, resolved at his Accession to the Crown, to endeavour to reduce this exorbitant Power within due Bounds. For that Purpose, he began with the Nobility, that their Union with the Clergy might the less obstruct his Designs. The Affairs which employed him some Years in France, prevented him from immediately setting about this Work. But as soon as he was clear of these Hindrances, he resolved to lose no time, and begin it the Moment he returned to England. This was the Cause of his so earnestly recommending Becket to be Archbishop of Canterbury, because he expected a greater Compliance from him than any other. The Bishops in hand was the reforming several Abuses very detrimental to the State, but advantageous to the Clergy, and consequently very difficult to be remedied, unless the Bishops themselves lent their Assistance. There was need therefore of great Address, and of acting in Concert with the Archbishop of Canterbury, in so nice an Affair. To that end, it was necessary to fill the Sec with a Person on whom he could depend, and none seemed so proper as Becket, whom he had loaded with Favours. The Archbishop's returning the Great Seal, made the King imagine he was mistaken in his Conjectures. Perhaps his Vexation at this Proceeding caused him not to humour the Pride of this Prelate, to whom he could not forbear, at his Arrival in England, to shew some Coldness. In all likelihood, Becket had been acquainted with the King's Designs, whilst Chancellor; and was then disposed to approve them; but after his Promotion to the Archbishoprick, had taken a contrary Resolution. Notwithstanding his Obligations to the King, he was determined to cross him in the execution of his Projects. He flattered himself with gaining immortal Glory in a vigorous Defense of the Cause of the Clergy, which was affectingly called the Cause of God.

One of the greatest Grievances to be redressed, was the Remissness in punishing Priests convicted of any Crime. The Clergy having by degrees acquired an absolute Power over all that belonged to their Body; when a Clergyman was accused, the Matter was tried in the Ecclesiastical Court, from whence lay no Appeal; but the Trials were formed, with such Indulgence to those the Court could not but condemn, that the most enormous Crimes were punished only with Degradation, and others with a short Suspension, or easy Confinement. The Laity could not, without extreme Concern, see themselves subject to the utmost Rigour of the Laws for Offences, which rendered Clergymen liable only to some very slight Corrections, and loudly complained of it. On the other hand, the Clergy, sure of Impunity, daily committed upon the Laity Outrages which they durst not repel, for fear of incurring a Punishment. This Abuse, which was already carried too far, increased every Day. It was proved in the Presence of the King, that since his Accession to the Crown, above a hundred Murders were committed in the Kingdom by the Ecclesiastics, of whom not one was punished so much as with Degradation, which was the usual Penalty enjoined in the like Cases, by the Canons. What was still more astonishing, the Bishops gloried in this their Indulgence: They were of Opinion they could not give surer Marks of their Zeal for Religion and the Service of God, than by maintaining, to the utmost of their Power, these pretended Immunities of the Clergy, and consequently all the Abuses that sprung from thence.

They were but nine at first, and their Business was to lead in their Armour, Christian Strangers and Pilgrims through the Holy-Land. They increased to at length that they had great Estates in all Parts of Christendom; and growing too Potent they were suppressed by Clement V. 1306, and by the Council of Vienna 1312. The Master of the Temple here in England, was summoned to Parliament; from whom the Monks of the Temple Church has his Name.

Things, standing thus, it happened, a little after the King's Return, that a Clergyman of the Diocese of Sarum (1) committed a Murder. The Matter being brought to the Archbishop's Court, it was decreed, the Murderer, as a Punishment for his Crime, should be deprived of his Benefice, and confined to a Monastery (2). The King being informed of this Sentence, very warmly expostulated with the Archbishop (3), for punishing so slightly, a Crime which was Death by the Laws of the Land. Becket received this Expostulation as if it had been entirely groundless, and boldly asserted the Immunities of the Church, and Privileges of the Clergy. He affirmed, an Ecclesiastick ought not to be put to Death for any Crime whatever. Henry replied, that being appointed by God to administer Justice to all his Subjects, without Distinction, he did not understand why these pretended Immunities should screen Malefactors of what Order soever, from the Punishments they deserved: That it was improbable God should take Pleasure in authorizing Offences in his Ministers, who rather ought to be punished more severely than Laymen. Then, he declared, that since the Ecclesiastick Court was so favorable to Clergymen, his Intent was, that heinous Offences, such as Murder, Robbery, and the like, should be tried in his Courts. Becket made answer, he would never allow that the Clergy should be tried any where but in the Ecclesiastick Courts, where care should be taken to punish them according to the Canons. That if they were condemned to be degraded, and afterwards committed other Crimes, the King's Judges might punish them as they thought fit; but it was unjust to punish them twice for the same Offence. This Dispute being carried on with great Warmth, the King and the Archbishop parted extremely dissatisfied with one another. Nay, Becket had so little Regard for the King, that, without considering the Passion he had put him into, he took this Occasion to upbraid him for unjustly depriving him of the Custody of the Castle of Rochester, and thereby notoriously violating the Privileges of the See of Canterbury (4). To these Occasions of Complaint, which he then gave the King, he quickly added two others. He summoned the Earl of Clare to do him Homage for the Castle of Tunbridge, which he pretended was a Pief of the Archbishoprick, without vouchsafing to acquaint the King with his Pretensions. The Earl answered, he held his Castle of the King by Knight's Service, which had no relation to the Archbishoprick (5). If we may judge by Becket's Temper, his Claim to the Castle must have been very doubtful, since he let the Affair drop without pushing it any farther. This Attempt failing, he took occasion to extend his Jurisdiction, by collating one Lawrence a Priest to the Rectory of Ainesford, without regarding the Patron's Right of Presentation. But the Patron, who was a Baron of the Realm, being unwilling to lose his Right, hindered Lawrence from taking Possession of the Benefice. The Archbishop looking upon this as an heinous Offence, excommunicated the Patron, who applied to the King. As Matters then stood with Henry, he was extremely provoked at the little Regard shown him by the Archbishop. For, since William the Conqueror, it had been the Prerogative Royal, that no Tenant in Capite should be excommunicated without the King's Knowledge. But this was the very thing Becket designed to dispute. And perhaps he had made this Step purely to have occasion to move the Question.

Henry was extremely mortified to find himself so far from the Execution of his Project. He was incensed to the last Degree against Becket, who seemed to make it his Business to cross him upon all Occasions, and dispute even his very Prerogatives. And therefore he resolved to take new Measures to accomplish his Design. He was sensible, it would be in vain to expect any Compliance from the Clergy, as long as the Archbishop of Canterbury so plainly opposed him. However, not to be too hasty, he was willing first to try gentle Methods. He caused the Archbishop to be put in mind of the many Favours received from his Sovereign, and the Mischiefs his Obstinacy was probably going to bring on the Church and Kingdom. But these Remonstrances proving ineffectual, he found himself obliged to contrive means to execute, in spite of the Archbishop, what he had resolved to accomplish with his Help. So far was Becket's Opposition from causing him to alter his Mind, that it made him the more eager to reduce the Power of the Clergy within its just Bounds. To that purpose, he assembled the principal Lords of the Kingdom as well Spiritual as Temporal, to consider of Methods to redress the Grievances introduced into the State. When they were met, he complained of the Proceedings of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and endeavored to make them sensible, that if care was not taken to curb that haughty and enterprising Prelate, he would at length usurp all the Prerogatives of the Crown, under vain Pretences of Religion. He added, that the Steps already taken by the Archbishop, were plain Indications of his Designs, which could not be too speedily prevented. The Majority of the Temporal Lords, among whom were few but what were offended at Becket's Haughtiness, rejoiced at this Occasion to humble him. Besides, they desired nothing more, than to have it in their Power to clip the Wings of the Clergy, who missed no Opportunity to soar above the rest of the Nation. The King perceiving them thus disposed, moved a Regulation, which he assured them was absolutely necessary for the Preservation of good Order and Tranquillity in the Kingdom. This Regulation consisted of five Articles, called by the King the Customs of Henry I. his Grandfather (6), because they were observed in the Reign of that Prince. The I. was, that none should appeal to Rome without the King's Leave. II. That no Archbishop or Bishop should go to Rome, upon the Pope's Summons, without the King's License. III. That no Tenant in chief, or any other of the King's Officers, should be excommunicated, or his Lands put under an Interdict, without the King's Consent. IV. That all Clergymen charged with Capital Crimes should be tried in the King's Courts. V. That the Laity, whether the King or others, should hold Pleas of Churches and Tithes and the like (7). These Articles were approved of without any Difficulty by the Temporal Lords; but the Bishops and Abbots refused to subscribe them, unless this Clause, which rendered them of no Effect, was added, Saving the Rights and Privileges of the Clergy and Church (8). The King provoked at their Refusal, suddenly quitted the Assembly, and went to Woodstock, after having however given the Chief among the Clergy to understand, he would take effectual Measures to set bounds to their Pride (9). The Prelates were so terrified at this Threat, that before they broke up, they resolved to send Deputies to the King to beg his Pardon, and assure him they were ready to comply with his Will. Becket long opposed this Resolution, but at last, pressed by his Brethren, yielded to their Importunity, and consented, the Articles should be admitted without the Saving Clause. All his Party following his Example, a Deputation was made (10), with which the King seemed highly satisfied, and the more, because it was done with unanimous Consent. Nevertheless, fearing Becket might fly from what he had done, on pretence this Convention was not sufficiently authorized to enact Laws of this kind, he resolved to have them ratified by an Assembly-General or Parliament. To this end he called a Parliament at Clarendon (11), and propounded the same Articles that were subscribed by the former Assembly. All the Lay-Lords ratifying them, the Prelates durst not openly oppose it. But when they came to sign, Becket and his Party scrupled it (12); and it was not without great Difficulty that he was prevailed upon to comply (13) at the Instances of the other Bishops (14).

How unwillingly soever the Archbishop subscribed the Articles (15), the King was highly pleased with it. He did not question in the least but the Pope would consent to Laws deemed necessary by the Bishops themselves. In this belief, he resolved to have them confirmed by a Bull, in order to take from the Prelates all pretence of recanting; but upon seeing the Article, the Pope not only refused to give them the Sanction of his Authority, but even condemned them as very prejudicial to the Church, and destructive of her Privileges. Shortly after, Becket again declared, he repented of signing the Constitutions of Clarendon, and thought himself guilty of so enormous a Crime, that he could hope for Pardon only from the Pope's Mercy. Accordingly he suspended himself (1), as unworthy to perform the Archbishop's Functions, till the Pope (2) should be pleased to absolve him. The Pope's Absolution being readily obtained, he resumed his Functions, upon the Pope's Assurances he should be supported. Mean while, Alexander, who was still in France, willing to make Henry believe he intended to keep fair with him, sent the Archbishop of Reims with Proposals of Accommodation; but as he had nothing positive to offer, and the King would not hearken to any Proposals, unless the Pope would confirm the Constitutions of Clarendon, there was no possibility of an Agreement.

When the King found, the Archbishop, proud of the Pope's Protection, daily grew more obstinate, he sought means to humble him. To this end, he involved him in Troubles, which indeed gave him great Vexation, but were capable of causing him to desist from his Pretensions (3). Among several Actions that were entered against him, there were two of Moment. The first related to a certain Manor which he was possessed of, and which John the King's Marshal pretended was unjustly detained for him. The Archbishop standing a Trial, was cast and condemned in a Fine of five hundred Pounds. This Sentence convinced him, that a Resolution was taken to plague him all manner of ways, and that he should lose all the Suits commenced against him. In this Belief he refused not to plead, chusing rather to be condemned for Non-appearance, than by a peremptory Decree. The King seemed hitherto not to intend to make him feel the whole weight of his Resentment; but soon after it appeared, his design was to crush him. To this Purpose he ordered him to be accused (4) of two Capital Crimes: The first was, for converting to his own Use the Revenues of the Archbishoprick of York, of which he had the Custody whilst he was Chancellor (5). In the second, he was charged with imbezeling thirty thousand Pounds Sterling of the King's Money. Instead of clearing himself from these Accusations, he answered, That when he was made Archbishop, Prince Henry, the King's Son, and the Justice (6) had acquitted him of all Accounts. Adding, that supposing he had not been acquitted, he was not bound to answer before Laymen, since he was invested with the first Ecclesiastical Dignity in the Kingdom. The former part of his Answer was certainly to his Disadvantage, since the Prince, from whom he had his Acquittance, was but seven or eight years old, though he had the Title of Guardian of the Realm, in the Absence of the King's Father. Besides, one would think, a Person of his Character should have been always ready to render an Account of his Administration, with regard both to the Profits of the vacant Benefices, and the King's Treasure; though from an Excess of Complaisance those that governed had dispensed with it. As for the latter Part of his Answer, he himself had cut off that Plea, by signing the Constitutions of Clarendon. But to this he replied, That the Pope having condemned these Constitutions, his Sentence was of more Force than all the Laws of the Land. How proper soever this Reply might be to gain the Pope's Favour, it could be of no use to him in the King's Court, where Judgment was to be given pursuant to the same Constitutions passed into a Law. He was therefore deemed not only as contumacious, but moreover as a Rebel against the Authority of the Laws. All possible Endeavours were used, to persuade him to own the Jurisdiction of the Court, but there was no obtaining that of him. He even refused to wait on the King (7), who sent for him (8) to try, whether, by discoursing with him in Person, he could bring him to some Temper (9).

This Refusal furnished the King with a fresh pretence to accuse him; first, for flying from Justice on frivolous Excuses; secondly, for Disobedience to the King. Upon these Charges, to which he would not plead, all his movable Goods were confiscated. How severe however this Sentence might be, the King was not satisfied. As he observed the Accusation was so formed as not to reach Becket's Person, he ordered him to be accused of Perjury and Treason, for violating the Oath taken to his Sovereign, and refusing to pay the Obedience due to him. The Archbishop was then thoroughly satisfied, the King was bent upon his Ruin. But this Belief, instead of inducing him to submit, served only to confirm him in his Obstinacy. Perhaps his proud and wilful Spirit would not suffer him to bend; or rather, he was resolved to render himself famous, by a Firmness, which, in his Opinion, ought to rank him among the most renowned Confessors in the Church. When it was found, there was no possibility of conquering him, the Court declared him guilty of Perjury; and the Bishops in particular sent him Word, they considered him not as their Primate, neither would they hold Communion with him any longer. All this not moving him in the least, he looked upon the Sentence passed upon him as void, and continued his Functions, regardless of the King's Displeasure.

The Court of Peers seem to have avoided giving Sentence on the Charge of Treason, which would have been Death, on purpose to leave him room to come off by submitting to the King. But finding he was still the same, the Court met once more to think of means to subdue his Perverseness. As soon as he was informed, the Barons were assembled in the Presence of the King, he went to Church, and ordered these Words of the second Psalm to be sung: The Rules take Counsel together against the Lord, and against his Anointed (10). Then taking his Cross in his Hand, he entered the Room where the King and the Lords were, without being sent too, or asking leave, though, since the Sentence passed upon him, he had no Right to be there. The Archbishop of York seeing Henry enter in that Posture, severely reprimanded him (11). He told him, that coming into the Royal Presence in that manner was bidding Defiance to the King; and bid him consider, his Sovereign's Weapon was sharper than his. Becket replied, It was true, the King's Weapon could kill the Body, but his destroyed the Soul and sent it to Hell. This Answer, which seemed to threaten the King with Excommunication, so provoked that Monarch, that he ordered the Lords to pass Sentence immediately on the new Crime Becket had just incurred. The Court, after a long Debate, declared, he deserved to be committed to Prison and punished according to Law, for insulting the King, and coming into the Assembly in such manner as might raise a Sedition among the People. This being resolved, the Barons of Chyflor and Cornwall were sent to summon him to appear and hear his Sentence: But he refused to come, declaring the Peers had no Authority to judge him, and that he appealed to the Pope. The two Earls replying to him, that by refusing to submit to the Laws of the Realm, he incurred the Guilt of Treason; he replied, That was not for the Restraints of his Character, he would vindicate himself in single Combat against those that should charge him with that Crime, and make them part of their Calumny. However he did not think proper to wait the Issue (12), but privately departed that very Night in Disguise, in order to retire into Flanders, going by the Name of Devoran (13).

The King of France gladly heard that the Quarrel between Henry and the Archbishop of Canterbury was not like to be adjusted. He was in hopes, Becket's being supported, would embroil his Sovereign in Troubles, of which France might make an Advantage; and therefore, lest him an Offer of his Protection, and a Refuge in his Dominions. Henry being informed of Lewis's Proceedings, sent Ambassadors (14) to represent to him, that it was very unbecoming a Sovereign to shelter Persons guilty of High-Treason. Lewis made Answer, He could not dispense 1164. with affording a Sanctuary in his Kingdom to the unfortunate: that Becket was of that Number, and he could not but consider him as such, till condemned by the Pope. It was thus that Jealousy and political Interest induced that Prince, to urge the Pope's Authority in a Thing so prejudicial to all Sovereigns. His Passion prevented him from reflecting that in this Affair he could not wound Henry but thro' his own Sides. But his extreme desire to embarras that Prince made him overlook these Considerations. He was not content with sheltering the fugitive Prelate, but even importuned the Pope to espouse his Cause, and turned Solicitor against Henry, whose Interest, in good Policy, he ought to have maintained.

There was no need of much Entreaty to gain the Pope (1). He was of himself very sensible, that a favorable opportunity offered to enlarge his Authority. Besides, he was apprehensive that, in case he deserted the Archbishop of Canterbury, none of the Clergy for the future, would support the Rights of the Church. So that the Downfall of this Prelate could not but prove of very dangerous Consequence to the Interests of the Clergy. As soon as he heard, Becket was condemned, and forced to fly like a Criminal, he was exceeding angry with Henry and the Barons of England, and threatened to make them repent of their Rashness. Mean time, Henry, in hopes of prepossessing the Pope in his Favour, sent Ambassadors (2) to inform him of all Particulars, and desire him to send Legates to England with full Powers finally to decide the Affair. The Archbishop of York, who was at the Head of this Embassy, spoke with great Vehemence against Becket. He charged him with want of Respect to the King, and of even threatening him with Excommunication. He maintained, the Archbishop was guilty of Rebellion, in refusing to stand to the Judgment of the Court of Barons, under the ridiculous Pretence, he was their Father, and that it was against Decency, for a Father to be judged by his Sons. Becket, who was present at this Audience (3), spoke likewise for himself, and endeavoured to justify his Conduct. He said in the first Place, he could not be obliged to answer in a Civil Court, without a direct Violation of the Canons of the Church. Secondly, Supposing he had thought proper to own the Authority of the Court, he should have been prevented from submitting to their Judgment by his certain Knowledge of their Resolution to condemn him. Lastly, He declared, he could not see wherein he had done amiss in appealing to the Pope; since it could not be denied that he was the proper Judge, from whom he expected an impartial Sentence. Then addressing himself to the Pope and Cardinals, he intreated them to consider the dangerous Consequences this Affair might be attended with, if they suffered him to be oppressed: That they were not to look upon this Business as a Contest between a Subject and his Sovereign, but as the Cause of the Universal Church; since it was certain, the King's Intention was to strip the Clergy of their Privileges. The Ambassadors perceiving by this Discourse, that his design was to engage the whole Church in his Quarrel, took occasion from thence, to insist still more earnestly on the King's Request, that the Affair might be tried in England by the Legates of the Holy See. By that they showed, the King their Master had no design against the Church, since he was willing to abide by her Judgment. This Demand was so reasonable, that the Pope had no other way to evade it, than by saying, he would take Cognizance of the Matter himself: adding, to justify this Resolution, that, in Imitation of the Almighty, he would not give his Glory to another. The Reason why the Pope declined sending Legates, was the fear of their being bribed. Mean while, he put off the Trial to a more convenient Season. For the present Conjunction allowed him not leisure to examine a Cause which required so much time to discuss. He was impatient to be at Rome, where he was recalled upon the Death of Isidor his Rival. However the Schism was still kept on foot, by the Cardinals of the opposite Party electing another Pope, who assumed the Name of Papchal III.

Henry being extremely incensed at Alexander's Proceedings, as a Mark of his Repentment, forbid under the severest Penalties all Appeals to Rome (4). This Prohibition was quickly followed by an express order to commit to Prison all the Relations of those that accompanied Becket in his Flight, or were gone to join him since his Departure. After this, he sequestered, in the Hands of the Bishop of London, the Revenues of all the Ecclesiasticks that openly espoused the Archbishop's Quarrel, to put 'em out of their Power to assist him. Moreover he enjoined the Magistrates to punish upon the spot, as Traitors, all Persons that should be taken either with the Pope's or Becket's Letters or Mandates about them, importing the Excommunication of any private Person, or an Interdict upon the Kingdom. He ordered likewise the Revenues of the See of Canterbury to be seized, with all the Archbishop's Effects (5). Lastly, Not content with rebidding Prayers for him in the Church, he banished all his Relations, not sparing even the most distant.

These rigorous Proceedings served only to exasperate the Archbishop the more, who, on his part, excommunicated all that adhered to the Constitutions of Clarendon, and particularly some Lords of the Council (6), who M. Paris however despised his Censures. At length, finding the King was bent to maintain his Ground, he took the Liberty to send him a threatening Letter, which it will not be amiss to insert, as a Piece very proper to discover the Character of that Prelate.

THOMAS Archbishop of Canterbury to the KING of England.

"I Have most earnestly desired to see you; and although I cannot deny, that in This I had a View to my own, yet was it your Interest that lay nearest my Heart. I was in hopes that when you should see me again, you would call to mind the many Services I have done you, with all imaginable Regard and Affection. For the Truth of which I appeal to him who is to judge all Mankind, when they shall appear before his Tribunal, to be rewarded according to their Deeds. I flattered my self that you would be moved with Compassion towards me, who am forced to beg my Bread in a strange Land, though by the Grace of God I have plenty of all things necessary for my Subsistence. I receive however great Consolation from the Words of the Apostle, They that live in Christ shall suffer Persecution; and likewise from that Saying of the Prophet, I never saw the Righteous forsaken, nor his Seed begging their bread. As to what I write to you, I cannot but be sensibly affected with it for three Reasons: First, because you are my Liege-Lord: Secondly, because you are my King: Thirdly, because you are my Spiritual Son. As my Liege-Lord, I owe and offer you my best Advice, such however as is due from a Bishop, Saving the Honour of God and the Head of the Church. As my King, I owe you a profound Respect, and withal am bound to direct my Admonitions to you. As my Son, it is my Duty to correct and exhort you. Kings are anointed in three Places; the Head, the Breast, and the Arms, which denote Glory, Holiness, and Power. We find from several Instances taken from the Scriptures, that the Kings who despised the Commandments of the Lord, were deprived of Glory, Understanding, and Might: Such were Pharaoh, Saul, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar, and many others. On the contrary, they that humbled themselves before God, received a larger Measure of Grace, and in greater Perfection. This was experienced by David, Hezekiah, and some others. Take therefore, my Liege-Lord, the Advice of your Vassal: hearken, my King, to the Admonitions of your Bishop; and receive, my Son, the Corrections of your Father; lest you are drawn aside into Schism, or persuaded to leave Communion with Schismatics. All the World knows with what Honour and Devotion you received the Pope; how respectfully and zealously you protected the Church of Rome; and what suitable Returns the Church and Pope have made you. Remember therefore the Declaration you made, and even laid upon the Altar at your Coronation, to protect the Church of God in all her Immunities. Restore the Church of Canterbury, from which you received your Authority, to the State it was in under your Predecessors and mine: Otherwise be assured, that you will draw down on your Head the Wrath and Vengeance of God."

This Letter was little capable of appeasing the incensed King. And truly, it is very hard to believe, the Writer thought it proper for that end, or pen'd it with that Intent. First, time, James knowing, the King of France cherishe'd the Duke between him and the Court of Rome, by offering to assile the Pope, was willing to let his Holiness see how weak a Support he relied in case things came to an open Rupture. To this end he led a quæsiest Army (1), as well to prevent any Revolt the Pope might excite in his Dominions, as to be in a Readiness to oppose the King of France in case of an Attack (2). This Precaution hindered, no doubt, James from proceeding so vigorously as he intended, and made him sensible of the Danger of precipitating Matters. The contrary, a Prince supported with a strong Army has it always in his Power to render himself formidable to those who have more but spiritual Weapons to brandish. Mean while, the Bishop of London and the rest of the Suffragans of the Province of Canterbury, wrote to the Archbishop, on occasion of his Letter to the King, and remonstrated to him his Pride in writing to his Sovereign without the customary Salutations, as if he had written to an Interior. They represented to him, moreover, the mean Estate from whence the King had rais'd him to such Grandeur; his Ingratitude to a Prince whom he was so much indebted to; and his Arrogance in daring to threaten a Monarch so far exalted above him. In fine, they gave him notice they appeal'd to the Pope from whatever he should act for the future against them or the Kingdom, and appointed Alençon-Dave to produce the Reasons of their Appeal.

The King of England's Army threw the Pope under great Apprehensions. He was afraid, Henry would at length unite with the Emperor, and if so, the King of France would not be able, or at least, willing to protect him. This Consideration induced him to try to divert Henry from such a Thought, with the Hopes of seeing this Contest speedily ended to his Advantage. Accordingly, when Henry least expected it, Alexander appointed Legates (3) to go and decide the Affair in England, and ordered them to depart forthwith. He greatly extolled to the King this Condescension. But the Legates were hardly got out, when he clogged their Powers with Restrictions, that prevented them from giving a decisive Sentence. The Legates being arrived at London (4), and settling about the Business they were come upon, a fresh Obstacle unexpectedly occurred. Becket refused to put his Cause into their Hands, unless the King would first restore what he had taken from him or his Friends. He further insisted upon a general Revocation of all the King's Orders since the beginning of the Contest; that is, in a word, that he would condemn himself beforehand. This is a clear Evidence, the Legates had not full Powers to decide the Matter, since the Archbishop's Refusal to stand to their Judgment, without these Conditions, was sufficient to stop their Proceedings. Accordingly, the King easily saw the Pope intended only to amuse him. Meantime, Becket's own Friends, dreading the King would go to Extremities, advised him to give his Sovereign some Satisfaction. He told them he was ready to comply with the King's Will, Saving his Honour, the Church's Possessions, his own and the Right of others. So many Salvo's must have shewn, he was not inclinable in the least to relax. However, these same Friends, who had so good an Opinion of him, as to believe he was willing to sacrifice his private Interests to the Church's Peace, made him another Proposal. They asked him, Whether he would agree to resign the Archbishoprick, in case the King would, upon that Condition, give up the Constitutions of Clarendon? But they did not find him at all disposed to show that Proof of his Disinterestedness. He plainly told them, the Proposal was unequal, since he could not renounce his Dignity without betraying the Cause of God and of the Church; whereas the King was bound in Conscience to annul his new Laws. This Reply, and the limited Powers of the Legates, entirely destroyed all the King's Hopes, and made him resolve to create the Archbishop as much trouble as possible. To that end, he sent word to the Abbot of Pontigny, who had for two years entertained Bede in his Monastery, that if he bestowed him any longer, he would lose the Dominions all the Monks of his Order would give their Estates. Upon this, Bede was forced to quit the Abbey; but it was not long before he met with a more Retreat. The King of Ireland invited him into his Court, where he often resided, and lastly settled amongst him with all things necessary. His frequent Conventions with that Monarch, were a great means of increasing the Jealousy and Animosity he had already entertained against Henry (-).

Towards the latter end of this Year Queen Elisabeth was delivered of a fourth Son, called John. The Birth of this Prince was quickly followed by the Death of the Empreſs Matilda, the King's Mother, in the ſixteenth Year of her Age (8). She left in her Will very conſiderable Legacies to the Poor and the Churches, and bequeathed a large Sum for building the Bridge of Reas, of which the had laid the Foundation.

Hitherto the Pope and Archbishop had but little Regard to board of the Success of their Contest with Henry Becket, deprived of his Revenues, languished in a melancholy Exile, whilst the Pope received no Profits from England. His Holiness easily forelaw, if things remained in this State, his Authority was like to be enervated, not only in England, but in other parts of Ch. Britain. Besides, he was of an exceding haughty Temper. This is the same Alexander, that some Years after, treated shamefully the Emperor Fredrick Barbarossa at Vienne (6).
 There was no hopes therefore, that a Pope of his Character would suffer the King to get the Victory without long and violent Struggles. Accordingly, as soon as his Affairs were something settled, he began seriously to think of means to end this Contest to his Advantage. To make the King uneasy, he showed extraordinary Regard for Becket, and confirmed to him all the Privileges enjoyed by his Predecessors, affecting by this uncommon Respect to insult the King. And indeed, there was no occasion of making this Step, whilst the Archbishop was in Exile, and out of favour with his Sovereign. Henry, willing to be even with him, caused it to be rumored, that he was going to withdraw his Obedience from Alexander, and recognize Papchal III. Nay, he even went so far as to write to some of the Princes of Germany, to recognize them, he was just upon the Point of taking this Resolution. The Truth is, if the Thing had been in his Power, he would, very probably, have taken that Step, without farther consideration; but it would have been difficult to bring the Nation to this Change, and especially the Clergy. He had but few Effects on his side. All the rest of the Clergy were for the Pope, and Becket in their Hearts, though they kept them from showing it openly. Alexander, knowing their Inclinations, was the more stout, and expressed his Regard for the King, that he would have done, without doubt, had he been in any danger from that Side. To let the King see, his Threats gave him no concern, he sent a Letter to the Bishop of London, wherein he seemed to throw off all Regard for that Prince. He commanded the Bishop boldly to admonish him, and enjoin him, in his Name, to restore the Archbishop of Canterbury to his See, and annul the Constitutions of Glouc. adon. The Bishop discharged his Commission, though not so imperiously as the Pope had commanded. However, he was not afterwards, to represent that the King had made no Innovations, but only traced in the Steps of his Predecessors; that his Conduct could not in Reason be blamed, since he offered to submit to the Judgment of the Church, provided the Affair was tried in the Kingdom (10).

Whatever Advantage the King had hitherto gained, he wanted to clear his Hands of this troublesome Business, which obstructed the Execution of the Design he had formed to conquer Ireland. Besides, he foresaw, this Dispute would in the end turn to his Disadvantage, and be very prejudicial to the Nation. In this belief, he desired the King of France to appoint a Place where they Two 1168. might have an Interview with the Archbishop, to hear what he had to say in his Defence. Learn is going to this Request. Becket appears before the two Kings (1), and very boldly pleaded his Cause. After which, being asked whether he would own that he ought to obey his Sovereign, he made answer, He was ready to pay Obedience to him in all things, Saving the Honour of God. How reasonable for this Salvo might appear, Henry looked upon it as an Evasion. He told the King of France what Becket seemed to promise was nothing at all; times by this Refraction, he refused a Power to pronounce whatever displeased him, contrary to the Honour of God: But, continued he, I shall make him this Offer, which cannot be suspected of a double Meaning: There have been in England Kings not so powerful as my self, and Archbishops that have been great and holy Men; let him but pay me the same Regard as the Grants of his Predecessors paid the Leaf of mine, and I will be satisfied. This was not what Becket wanted. He knew very well, it would be difficult to justify his Pretensions by any former Precedents. And therefore, he rejected the Offer, on pretence that the Affairs being now before the Pope, he could agree to nothing without his Consent. How great Partiality toward the King of France had all along shewn to Becket, he could not help owning on this occasion, that the Archbishop's Obstinacy was the sole Obstacle to a Peace. This Confession was very serviceable to Henry, as it quitted, in great measure, the Report, so industriously spread in the World, of his designing to abolish in England the Privileges of the Clergy. However, it made no Impression on Becket, as well knowing the Pope was too much interested, and too deeply engaged in the Affair ever to draw back.

1169. It plainly appeared, Becket was not mistaken, for, presently after, Alexander sent the King notice he could not dispense with granting the Archbishop a Power to revenge with the Sword of Excommunication, the injuries done the Church and his own Person. As soon as Becket received the Pope's Leave, he thundered Anathemas against such Numbers of the Clergy, that there was scarce enough left unexcommunicated to officiate in the King's Chapel. Though most were inclined to favour the Cause he maintained, he was not satisfied, but charged them with shameful Prevarication, in not openly espousing his Quarrel.

Henry, provoked at these Proceedings, appealed to a future Council, and sent the Pope word, that unless he immediately dispatched Legates with Power to decide the Affair, he should take such Measures as would not be agreeable to him. This Menace threw Alexander into great Perplexity, because he could not help taring the Union of the King with the Emperor. On the other hand, he was so engaged in the Defence of the pretended Rights of the Church, that he could not desert without great Prejudice to the Holy See. To free himself from this Unpleasantness, he had recourse to the usual Methods always successfully practised by the Court of Rome on the like Occasions. He feigned to be willing, the Affair should be tried in England; and to allure Henry with these hopes, sent away Legates, who met the King in Norwich. But as they were preparing to wait on him, they received secret Instructions forbidding them to give a final Sentence, without importing it to the Archbishop of Sens. This was sufficient to blast all hopes of a sudden Peace, none being more averse to it than that Prelate.

Some time after, the Pope willing to keep Henry still in a Belief that matters might be amicably adjusted, desired the two Kings of England and France to consider of means to end the Dispute. Whereupon, Henry replying to Paris, Becket was ordered to appear once more before these two Princes. This Conference, purposely intended to amuse Henry, succeeded no better than the former (2). The Archbishop, without yielding the least Point, still insisted, that before a Treaty was begun, the King ought to make entire Restitution (3), to which Henry would not consent, without knowing first the Terms of Reconciliation. This was all Becket could have expected by way of Compensation, in case he himself had made any Concessions. But to pretend that the King should begin with condemning himself by this Restitution, without any Advances on his Part, was in Effect to declare, he must come to no Agreement. The only thing he could expect as a Sign of his Inclination to Peace, was that he should stand to the Judgment of the French Divines. But this Offer being rejected, the Negotiation broke off, with some Advantage however to the King, as it rendered his Disposition to Peace more conspicuous.

There is no adjusting a Quarrel with the Clergy, unless their Demands are all answered. Their Cause, as they pretend, is the Cause of God, and consequently no Concessions can be made without Sin. Upon this Principle it was that the Archbishop of Sens pressed the Pope to put England under an Interdict, and excommunicate Henry for an obstinate Heretic. Henry having Advice of what this Prelate was soliciting at Rome, published a sixth Edict in England, forbidding the receiving any Orders from the Pope or Becket, and declaring, in case a Letter of Interdict should come into the Kingdom, all that submitted to it should be immediately hanged, as Traytors to their King and Country. In fine he enjoined all absent Clergymen to return to their Churches on pain of forfeiting all their Revenues, and suspended the Payment of Peter Pence to other Orders. These vigorous Proceedings making the Pope apprehensive of some dangerous Revolution, though he carry things to extremity, he left the Affair undetermined, in expectation of an Opportunity to push it with more Advantage to himself.

During this Calm, Henry, who had spent near four Years in France, returned home (4) in order to settle some Matters, which his Absence had hindered him from attending to. The Administration of Justice was so shamefully neglected, that at his Arrival he found himself obliged to send Commissioners (5) into all the Counties with full Powers to enquire into the Misbehaviour of the Magistrates (6), and to punish the guilty.

This and some other Affairs concerning the publick Good being settled to the People's Satisfaction, Henry convened a General Assembly (7), at which were present the Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Sheriffs, Barliffs, and Aldermen of the principal Cities of the Kingdom. Before this numerous Assembly he caused Henry his eldest Son to be crowned (8) by the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Bishops of London and Durham (9). The next Day the young King received the Fealties of all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and of the Magistrates of the Cities and Counties, who were summoned on purpose to be present at the Coronation. At the Feast, made upon this Occasion, the King himself would carry up the first Dish, and speaking to his Son, told him, Never was Monarch served in a more honorable Manner. Instead of returning his Compliment, the young King, who was of a very haughty Spirit, turning to the Archbishop of York, who stood by him, said in a low Voice, It was no such great Condescension in the Son of an Earl to serve the Son of a King.

This Coronation, performed with an universal Approbation, gave the King a double Satisfaction. He not only, by that means, secured the Crown in his Family, but moreover extremely mortified Becket. Indeed that Prelate was exceedingly vexed to hear that a Ceremony of that Importance was solemnized without him; it being, as he pretended, an Office annexed to the Dignity of Archbishop of Canterbury (10).

The King of France took great Offence at his Daughter's not being crowned with the Prince her Spouse. This Dispute, joined to some other Occasions of Quarrel, which are but too frequent among neighbouring Princes, caused him to take up Arms again (11). But this War was of so little Consequence and short Continuance, that it is entirely needless to descend to Particulars. It suffices to say in two Words, that it was almost as soon ended as begun, by a Treaty of Peace between the two Monarchs.

Shortly after Henry was seized with a violent Fever at Domfront, in the Province of Maine. He was so dangerously ill, that believing, he was near his end, he hastily made his Will. To Henry his eldest Son he gave Normandy, Normandy, Maine and Anjou; and to Richard, his second Son Gwynne and Britany. As for Geoffrey, he thought Britagne sufficient for him, which he was to enjoy 1171. wife, his Canonization might have been objected against. Nothing was more proper to infuse this Belief into the Minds of the People than Miracles. Accordingly, such Multitudes were forthwith wrought at the Tomb of the new Martyr, that in any other Age, the Number and Nature of these Miracles, instead of satisfying the World, would have had a quite contrary Effect. Neither Christ nor his Apostles worked the like, or so many, to prove the Truth of Christianity, as this new Saint did to authorize the Privileges and Immunities of the Clergy. It was not thought sufficient to assert his restoring dead Men to Life; but it was further affirmed, he raised the very Beasts. It was given out for certain, that being exposed to view in the Church before he was buried, he rose out of his Coffin, and went and lighted the Wax-Candles which had been put out. It is said also, after the Funeral Ceremony was over, he held up his Hand to bless the People. To all these Miracles, many others are added, equally becoming the Majesty of God. Mean while, they were spread with that Confidence, that not a Man was found hardly enough to show the least Sign of doubt. The Pope's Legates, sent some time after to examine these Matters, found the People at Canterbury so perverted of the Truth of all these Facts, that, upon such public Evidence, his Holiness thought he should run no great hazard in canonizing Becket by the Name of St. Thomas of Canterbury. The Tomb of the new Saint was at first adorned with few Ornaments; but fifty years after his Death, his Body was laid in a Shrine, enriched with a prodigious Quantity of precious Stones. As a farther Honour to his Memory, the Pope ordered every fiftieth Year a Jubilee to be solemnized in the Church where he lay. From thenceforward Miracles became so common at his Tomb, and their Fame spread so far, that they drew Votaries from all Parts of Christendom, who came to Canterbury to obtain the Intercession of this new Saint. In 1420, they kept an Account of above fifty thousand Foreigners, of all Ages and Sexes, that came in Pilgrimage that Year to this renowned Tomb.

To avoid interrupting the Narrative of this famous Contest, I was obliged to defer till now to speak of certain Occurrences which happened in that Interval, the most remarkable whereof were as follows.

In 1165, during the heat of the Dispute, the Archbishop of Coeln came into England to conduct Matilda the King's Daughter to the Duke of Saxony, to whom she was betrothed. As all the Princes of Germany were then for the Antipope Paschal, they were considered as Schismatics in all Places where Alexander was acknowledged. This is the Reason, why after the Departure of the Archbishop, the Churches, where he and the Priests that attended him, said Mass, were all re-consecrated. The King durst not oppose this Resolution, for fear of making the Breach wider between him and Alexander, whom he was willing to keep fair with (1).

In 1166 certain Heretics arrived from Germany in England, about thirty in Number, being headed by one Gerhard. It is not distinctly known wherein their Heresy consisted, in all likelihood there were fathered upon them, by forced Inferences, Opinions which they entertained not. However this be, they were summoned before a Council held on purpose at Oxford, where they were condemned, and delivered over to the secular Power. The King, unwilling to give the Pope any handle against him, treated these People very severely. After branding them in the Cheek with a hot Iron, he forbid all his Subjects to give them any Relief. This Prohibition being punctually observed, all those Wretches miserably perished with Hunger, without being heard to utter the least Complaint of this most inhuman Usage. This is not the only Instance of its being the worst time for such as the Court of Rome marks out for Heretics, when Princes are at Variance with the Pope (2).

Malcolm King of Scotland died much about this time (3), and was succeeded by William his Brother (4).

The Marriage of Eleanor, Daughter of Henry, with Alphonfus King of Castile was concluded in 1169, a little before Becket's Return into England.

Conan the Little, Duke of Bretagne, dying in 1171, Prince Geoffrey, who had married his Daughter, succeeded him. But as he was not above twelve years old, the King his Father took the Guardianship upon himself, and went in Person into Bretagne, to receive the Fealty of the Barons.

These are the most considerable Events, during the Difference between the King and the Archbishop of Canterbury. I proceed now to what followed upon the Death of that Prelate.

Henry being freed from the Disturber of his Quiet, was in hopes to enjoy some Tranquillity. But he found that Becket, when dead, created him no less Trouble than when alive. His Enemies, the chief of whom were the King of France, and Archbishop of Sens, omitted not this Opportunity to raise him new Disturbances. They boldly charged him with being the Author of Becket's Murder, and endeavoured by all sorts of means to stir up the Pope to revenge the Death of his faithful Servant. Though it was difficult to prove that Henry had any Hand in the Assassination, Alexander was willing however to believe him guilty, that he might have occasion to humble a Prince that had all along stoutly opposed him. He was sensible, this was a favorable Juncture to procure Advantages which that Monarch could never be brought to yield at any other time. Wherefore he threatened to excommunicate him and put the Kingdom under an Interdict, unless he gave Marks of a sincere Repentance. Had this Prince been more weak, or less able, he would never have got clear of so slippery and dangerous an Affair. But his Resolution on this occasion (5), his Presents to the Cardinals (6), and his repeated Proteffations, to submit to the Sentence that should be pronounced in England, averted this terrible Blow (7).

Whilst this Affair was transacting at Rome, Henry resumed the Project of the Conquest of Ireland, formed some Years before, but deferred on account of his Quarrel with Becket. The Irish taking some Englishmen Prisoners, and afterwards selling them for Slaves, furnished him with a Pretence to form this Enterprize. But the real Motive was the desire of enlarging his Dominions by the Conquest of an Island adjacent to England (8). Two favorable Conjunctions induced him to think of this Conquest. In the first Place, he was at Peace with all his Neighbours. And secondly, Adrian IV. a Native of England, being then Pope, he hoped easily to obtain his Approbation. Though the Outrages committed by the Irish upon his Subjects might be one Reason of his intended Expedition, that was not the Thing he alledged to the Pope to obtain his Consent. The Glory of God and the Salvation of Souls, plausible Pretences, but which rarely set Princes upon Projects of this Nature, were the Arguments he urged to prevail with Adrian to approve his Design. To these he added another, and no less powerful Motive, the enlarging the Jurisdiction and Revenues of the Holy See. He pretended, the Irish being Schismatics and bad Christians, it was necessary to put them in the right way, and oblige them to acknowledge the Papal Authority, which till then had been disregarded by them: That the properest Means to that end was to bring them into Subjection to the Crown of England, which had ever been devoted to the Holy See. This is what we find in the Bull sent him by Adrian on this occasion, where we may further observe, what Power the Popes assumed to themselves, and how attentive they were to every Thing that might help to encrease their Authority.

Remarks on

“These are the Foundations of Henry's Pretensions to “Ireland. In reading the Bull, it is hard to know, which “of the two acted with the greateſt Diſimulation, the “King or the Pope. Henry alledged falſe Pretences to cover “his Ambition, and Adrian pretended to believe him, in “order to have the Diſpoſal of a Country which belonged “not to him, and the transferring it to a Prince who had “no manner of Right to it. But it is eaſy to diſcover, “through all theſe Diſguiſes, the Motives which influenced “the Pope. Ireland had not yet acknowledged the Superi“ority of the Roman See over the whole Chriſtian Church.
 “That was the Immorality which was to be rooted out of “the Field of the Lord. Submiſſion to the Biſhop of Rome, “was the Seed that was to be carefully ſown and cheriſhed,
 “to the end the Roman Church might reap a plentiful Har“veſt. What elſe can be meant by ſpreading the Know“ledge of the Truth, where the Chriſtian Religion was ſo “long before embraced. However this be, Henry, ſupported “with the Pope's Approbation, and authorized by his Ex“hortations, waited only a favorable opportunity to execute
 “his Deſign, which was obſtructed ſome Years by Becket's “Affair. He was no ſooner clear of that Incumbrance, but “he reſumed the ſame Project, bent upon executing it, the “Moment he ſhould make a Peace with France, with which “he was then at War. However, though the War was “not yet ended, an opportunity offered, which he failed not “to embrace. But before I relate the Succeſs of this Un“dertaking, it will be neceſſary to give ſome Account of “that Iſland, which we ſhall ſoon ſee united to the Engliſh “Monarchy.

Ireland.

“Ireland is ſituated on the Weſt of Great-Britain, from “which it is parted by an Arm of the Sea, called St. George's “Channel, in ſome Places not above three Leagues wide.
 “The Iſland is in length from South to North, about three “hundred, and in Breadth from Eaſt to Weſt two hundred, “Miles. It is certain, in all Europe there is not a more temperate Climate than that of Ireland. Exceſſive Heat “and Cold are ſeldom known there, becauſe the Vapours, “riſing from the ſurrounding Sea, generally qualify theſe “two Extremes. The Soil is very fertile, eſpecially in the “ſouthern Parts. They who ſay no Wheat grows there, “mean, no doubt, the northern Parts, where the People “commonly live upon Oat-Bread. But every where elſe

 “there is good Wheat, and in Plenty ſufficient for the Suſ“ſiſtence of the Natives. However the Iſland abounds “moſt with Paſture-Grounds, and its chiefſt Wealth con-“ſiſts in a great Breed of Cattle. The Sea is ſtocked with “ſuch Plenty of Fiſh, that were the Inhabitants deſtitute
 “of all other Food, that alone would be ſufficient to ſuſtain “them. But the moſt conſiderable Advantage, this Iſland “enjoys, is a commodious Situation for Trade and Com“merce, not only with all Europe, but other Parts of the “World. Add to this the great Number of good Ports “which facilitate the Exportation of its Commodities.
 “Theſe Advantages have ſo raiſed the Jealouſy of the Engliſh, that ever ſince their Conqueſt of the Iſland, they “have had nothing more at heart than the preventing of “the Irish from extending their Commerce, leſt the Trade “of England ſhould thereby receive too great a Prejudice.
 “It is no wonder, an Iſland ſo fertile, ſo well ſituated, and “ſo near England, ſhould attract the Eyes of Henry II, “who ſet no Bounds to his Ambition.

“If we may believe ſome Irish Hiſtorians, the firſt Inha“bitants of this Iſland are to be traced beyond the Flood.
 “But others, leſs prejudiced in this Point, give the follow“ing Account of their Origin. They pretend, that from “the third Age of the World, Ireland was inhabited with “Scythians, whoſe Number, in the fourth (1), were conſidera-“bly augmented by Colonies of Spaniards. Theſe two Na-“Country of Iren or Erin. The Etymology of the Word “Erin is not well known ; but Cæſar's Conjecture, who “derives it from an Irish Word ſignifying Wet, ſeems very “probable, becauſe in reality Ireland is the moſt westerly “Iſland of Europe (2). Iſidore and Bede call it Scotia, with “reſpect to the Inhabitants, who for the moſt part came “from Scythia, as was ſaid before, and for that reaſon were “called Scots. The ſame Writers term it alſo Scotia Major,

 “to diſtinguiſh it from North-Britain inhabited by the ſame “Nation. Others give it the Name of Britannia Parva, “to diſtinguiſh it from Great-Britain, pretending that all the “Iſles in thoſe Parts ſhould be called the Britannick Iſlands.
 “We are ſtill more in the dark with regard to the Origin

the Desolations were that this Island suffered from the Hands of Foreigners, intestine Divisions caused still greater Mischiefs. The Irish were hardly freed from the Invasions of the Foreigners, and particularly the Danes, who made them, no less than the English, feel the Effects of their Fury, when a Civil War broke out among them, which ended in the Partition of the Island into several petty States. These Kingdoms, which at first were numerous, and consequently very small, were at length reduced to seven, namely, Connaught, Cork, Leinster, Ossery, Meath, Limerick, and Ulster (1). The King of Connaught, the principal of these petty Sovereigns, kept the rest in a sort of Dependence, with much the same Authority as the Anglo-Saxon Monarchs formerly enjoyed during the Heptarchy. This is the Reason why the Irish Annals give Roderic King of Connaught, who reigned in the Time of Henry II, the Title of Monarch, though there were more Kings besides him in the Island. Such was the State and Condition of Ireland, when the English undertook the Conquest of it (2). A Difference between two of these Kings, the weakest of whom invited the English to his Assistance, was the occasion of the Irish losing their Liberty. This was not the first Time, the like Cause had produced the like Effect. An Imprudence of the same Nature furnished the Moors with an opportunity of conquering Spain, and the Anglo-Saxons, of subduing Britain. Hence it appears how dangerous it is to invite Foreigners into a Kingdom, who cannot be afterwards expelled with the same Ease.

Among the Sovereigns then reigning in Ireland, Dermot King of Leinster, was one of the most considerable, by the Extent of his Dominions. From this Prince's Accession to the Throne, he had acted so arbitrarily, that he was grown extremely odious to his Subjects. But he made flight of his People's Hatred, being at Peace with his Neighbours, who concerned not themselves with what passed in that Kingdom. However, he afterwards gave them occasion himself, by [debauching and] carrying away the Wife of O-Roric King of Meath. O-Roric, to revenge the Affront, levied an Army, and with the help of Roderic King of Connaught, attacked Dermot, who, finding himself abandoned by his Subjects, was forced to leave Ireland, for fear of falling into the Hands of his Enemy. As he had no refuge in the Island, where the rest of the Kings refused to engage in his Quarrel, he went and implored the Protection of the King of England, who was then in France. Having informed him of his Case, he promised to become his Vassal, if by his Aid he was restored to his Throne. Nothing could be more grateful than this Proposal to a Prince who had been long meditating the Conquest of Ireland, and wanted only an opportunity to interpose in the Affairs of that Island. Mean while, as his War then with France, permitted him not immediately to assist the fugitive King, he contented himself with promising, as soon as the War was over, to aid him to the utmost of his Power. Nevertheless, he thought it his Interest to persuade Dermot to begin a War, from whence he hoped himself to reap great Advantage. To that end, he advised him to go into England, and endeavour to obtain what Assistance he could from some English Barons, in expectation of greater Forces. Dermot followed his Advice, and relying on Henry's Word, came into England, where Robert Fitz-Stephen, and Richard Strong-bow (3) Earl of Pembroke, agreed with him upon certain Conditions. The former was prevailed with in hopes of making a considerable Fortune in Ireland. The latter, who had large Possessions in England and Wales, was gained by Dermot's Promise, to give him his only Daughter in Marriage, and settle the Succession upon him.

These two Lords having drawn together some Troops among their Friends and Vassals, Fitz-Stephen, who was first ready, accompanied Dermot into Ireland, with four hundred Men (4). Being landed near Waterford, the King of Leinster led them before the City of Wexford, not far from thence. This City being presently taken, was given to Fitz-Stephen, who settled there a Colony of English (5). After this Exploit, the Adventurers re-in-forcing their little Army to the Number of three thousand Men by the Junction of the Natives (6), marched against the King of Ossery. This Prince, who did not expect to be attacked, being unprepared for his Defence, was forced to submit to what Terms the Conquerors were pleased to impose.

Mean time, Roderic the Monarch had convened the States of the Island, and caused them to resolve upon a War with Dermot and the English. Indeed, it was easy to perceive, their Designs were not confined to the Assistance of the King of Leinster. But as the Adventurers were now grown very formidable, he was willing, before he ran any hazard, to try the way of Negotiation, to get them out of the Island. He addressed himself first to Fitz-Stephen, and offered him a considerable Sum to retire.

His Offer being rejected, he turned to Dermot, and endeavoured to persuade him to send away the English, by promising to restore him to his Kingdom. Dermot immediately closed with this Proposal; but when they came to perform their Covenants, mistrusting each other, they could agree neither upon the Time nor the Manner. Whilst they were employed in devising Expedients for their mutual Security, the Earl of Pembroke arrived from England with twelve hundred Men. His first Expedition was the taking of Waterford, and putting the Inhabitants all to the Sword. This Conquest breaking off the Negotiation, the Earl of Pembroke married Dermot's Daughter, and quickly after took possession of the Kingdom of Leinster; fallen to him by the Death of his Father-in-law. The Irish gave that Prince the Surname of Ningal, that is, The Stranger's Friend.

After the Death of Dermot, the Adventurers prepared to carry on their Conquests. As they saw, the Terror of their Arms was spread over Ireland, they improved the Opportunity, and advancing farther, became Masters of Dublin, and some other Places. Roderic and the rest of the Kings were in such Confusion, that they very faintly opposed the Progress of the Foreigners. It is almost incredible that the Irish, who were exceeding numerous, should suffer themselves to be thus over-run by a handful of Englishmen. The Reason is imputed to their great Dread of the English Cross-Bows, the use of which, till then, was unknown to them.

Upon news of this extraordinary Success, Henry grew jealous of the Adventurers. He was in hopes they would have wanted his assistance, and thereby given him a Pretence to pass into Ireland himself, and subdue the Island. But finding, the faint Resistance of the Irish rendered his Aid needless, he was afraid, the Conquerors would become Masters of the whole Country, which he designed for himself. In this belief, he thought it necessary to oblige them to apply to him. To this end, he forbids the exporting Provisions or Ammunition to Ireland; and commands all his Subjects to return from thence. These Orders, which were issued on pretence the Adventurers had engaged in their Undertaking without his leave, succeeded to his Expectation. As soon as the Earl of Pembroke and Fitz-Stephen were informed of the King's Edict, they sent Deputies to assure him of their Obedience; and tell him, all their present and future Conquests were at his Command. This Submission easily appeased the King, who had no further Thoughts of recalling them. Some time after, he made an agreement with them, that he should have all the Sea-Ports, and the rest remain in the Conquerors, to hold of him and his Successors. Matters being thus settled, Henry went over himself into Ireland with a formidable Army (7), and landed at Waterford. The Irish, who before could not withstand a few private Persons, and consequently saw themselves unable to resist to great Forces, chose a voluntary Submission. During Henry's stay at Waterford, he saw all the Kings of the Island arrive at his Court, and with Emulation strive who should first swear Allegiance.

Thus Henry, without spilling one drop of Blood, became Master of Ireland in less time than was sufficient to travel over it. After he had placed fresh Garrisons in Waterford, Wexford, and some other maritime Towns, he

(5) These were the first English settled in Ireland, where they have continued ever since, retaining still our ancient Garb, and much of our old Language, with the mixture of Irish. Camden has given us a List of such as went into Ireland with Dermot. Who, (besides Richard Strong-bow, Robert Fitz-Stephen, Alfred de Vesp, (these are mentioned), were, Maurice de Prenderghast, Harvey de Mont-Marthy, Robert Barr, Malter Meistrans, Maurice Fitz-Gerald, Richard, William de Lacy, Richard de Cogan, Carlo de Redenford, Guider and Alexander, Sons of Maurice Gerald, William Notts, Robert Fitz-Richard, Hugh de Lacy, William Fitz-Albith, Widow Matard, Harvey Bohan, Hugh de Candemell, Philip de Hasting, Hugh Trell, David Hagg, Robert Lee, Obert de Harbert, William de Bedenage, Adam de Gervais, Philip de Brea, Giffin, Nephew of Stephen, Ralph Fitz-Stephen, Walter de Brea, Philip de Brea, Adam de Harford, John de Cury, Hugh Contin, Redmond Contin, Redmond Fitz-Hugh, Miles of St. David, &c. pursuant to his Agreement with the Adventurers, he came to Dublin, where he made some Regulations for the Government of his new Conquest (1). Shortly after, he set out for England (2), leaving at Dublin, Hugh Lacy, to govern the Island in his Name, with the Title of Justiciary of Ireland (3).

If they who are acquainted with the Largeness and Importance of the Kingdom of Ireland, are surprized at the Ease wherewith the English subdued it, they will have no less reason to wonder, when they see, in the Course of this History, how troublesome it was to keep it. There are who, considering the Blood and Treasure that were spent to maintain the English in their Conquest, scruple not to say, it would have been better for them, the Island had been in the bottom of the Sea. It is certain, their keeping it to this Day, is not so much for the Profit they receive from thence, as to prevent its falling into the Hands of a foreign Power. For, it cannot become subject to a new Master, without great Detriment to the Commerce of England.

Henry imagined, after marring so many Difficulties, he should pass the Residue of his Days in Peace, amidst the Grandeur and Glory he was encircled with. But he quickly found, there were other Vexations, besides those in Becket's Affairs, capable of disturbing his Felicity. During his Absence, a Conspiracy was formed against him, so much the more dangerous, as his Queen, and his own Sons were the Authors. Besides, it was countenanced by some of the principal Barons of the Realm (9), and several foreign Princes. Queen Eleanor was moved to it by her extreme Jealousy, of which the King had given her but too just Cause. Among his many Mistresses, Fair Rosamund, Daughter of the Lord Clifford, having the greatest Ascendant over him, became the principal Object of the Queen's Jealousy, who could not forbear threatening her. Henry fancied, he had secured her from all Attempts, by keeping her in a Labyrinth built on purpose at Woodstock. But his great Care proved all in vain.

Whilst he was in Normandy, the Queen taking Advantage of his Absence, found means to dispatch out of the way this hated Rival, that created her so much Uneasiness (10). After this Deed, despairing of ever regaining the King's Affection, she pursued her Revenge, and encouraged her Sons to revolt. Henry, his eldest Son, a young Prince of an exceeding haughty Temper, was weary of bearing the Title of King without the Authority. Richard, naturally turbulent and restless, was tired with being under the Discipline of the King, who indeed had made him Earl of Poitou, but suffered him not to enjoy that Favour. Geoffrey had still more Cause to complain than his Brothers. He saw himself deprived of the Government of Brittany, under the specious Pretence of a Guardianship, for which he thought he had no longer occasion. It was not difficult for these young Princes, to draw into the Conspiracy several English Barons, who hoped to enjoy more Credit and Authority under young Henry than under his Father. The King of France, ever jealous of Henry's flourishing Condition, very readily engaged in the Project of dethroning him. He was not satisfied with assisting the Princes himself, but caused the Earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blais his Vassals, (the last of whom was his Brother-in-law) to enter into the League. William King of Scotland was prevailed with also to be concerned in an Undertaking, which might procure him an Opportunity of recovering the Dominions, resigned by his Brother Malcolm to England. This Confederacy broke out on a sudden when Henry least expected it. Normandy, Guienne, Brittany, were attacked all at once by the Arms of the Confederates. The King of Scotland invaded Cumberland, and England was divided into two Parties, one for the young King and the other for his Father. But before I descend to particulars, it will be necessary to see first what Measures were taken by Henry's Enemies to surprize him.

After the Conquest of Ireland, Henry intending to go to Normandy, passed through England to take the King his Son along with him (11), being entirely ignorant of the Plots formed in his Absence. Upon his Arrival at Roan, he received a Letter from the King of France, expressing an earnest Desire to see his Daughter and Son-in-law, and intreating him to let them come and spend a few Days at Paris. The young Prince, having leave, forthwith repaired to the King his Father-in-law, with whom he took Measures, that the Confederates might all act at the same time. Mean while, as he deferred his Return under divers Pretences, Henry grew uneasy. Perhaps he had received

But after all, ancient Brompton's Authority is of less weight, than that of the old Ballad, it is certain that Rosamund, did not die in 1173, and that she was not poisoned by Queen Eleanor. Fitz-Stephen expressly says, That, after King Henry had imprisoned his Queen Eleanor, he became an Abbot, and so publicly, for a long while Rosamund. p. 1151. She was buried in the Church belonging to Godswin Nunney, near Oxford, where her Epitaph which Brompton gives you, was to be seen in his Time; and is as follows:

some dark Hints of what was contriving; or was apprehensive that by too long conversing with Leitis, ill Impressions might be made upon the young Prince. Be this as it will, he sent for him, and the young King durst not disobey, for fear of giving him a Suspicion of the Conspiracy, which it concerned him to keep secret. As soon as he came back, the King, with his Son, set out for Montferand, a small Town in Auvergne, where he was to hold a Conference with Hubert Earl of Maurienna, Alphonius Earl of Arragon and Barcelona, Girard Earl of Vienne, and Raymond Earl of Toulouse (1). What Business he had with these Princes, except the Earl of Maurienna, I know not. He was to treat with this last about a Marriage between John his fourth Son, and Alice, Daughter of that Earl. This Affair was begun at Montferand, but as it could not be ended there, Hubert accompanied the King to Limoges, where he pressed him to declare what he would do for the Prince his Son, on account of the Marriage. Henry offered to settle on John the Cities of Lodun, Chinon, and Mirebel, which the young King, who was present, opposed to the utmost of his Power. He alleged, it was very strange the King should assign an Appenage to his youngest Son, whilst he refused the same during his Life, to the eldest, who bore the Title of King without having wherewithal to support the Dignity. This Opposition created a great Coldness between the Father and Son, which was farther increased by the young King's demanding Normandy of his Father (2), 'till he should come to the Crown of England. His Aim in this Demand was only, to find a Pretence to complain, in order to open the Scene concerted with the King of France.

Henry began from that time to suspect what his Son had in his Mind (3). As he did not question but he had suffered himself to be corrupted by the King of France, he caused him to be so narrowly watched, that it was easy to see he was afraid of his getting away. On the other hand, the young Prince, dreading the Consequences if the King came to discover his Designs, resolved to prevent the Danger. What Care soever the Father might take, he could not hinder his Son from privately withdrawing from Court, and posting to the King of France (4). This entirely confirmed the old King in his Suspicions. But, he was still ignorant what his Son's Design might be. As soon as the Queen, who resided at London, had Intelligence of the King her Son's Arrival at Paris, she sent thither likewise Richard and Geoffrey, before Henry had time to give Orders about them. Thus the old King saw himself forsaken on a sudden by his own Family, without knowing yet what all these Proceedings would tend to. His Wrath, which he could not then vent upon his Sons, fell upon the Queen, whom he caused to be closely confined; but reaped no other Benefit from thence, but the Pleasure of being revenged (5). Quickly after, the confederate Princes attacking him in several Places, he stood in need of all his Resolution to bear so many Vexations, and of all his Prudence, to oppose so many Enemies. Richard repaired to Guienne, where he caused the greatest Part of the Country to rebel. Geoffrey raising an Insurrection in Bretagne, put himself at the head of it, with design to wrest from the King his Father the Government of that Dukedom. Normandy was attacked by the King of France, assisted by the Earls of Flanders, Burgundy and Blain. The King of Scotland made an Inruption into the northern parts of England (6). The Earl of Leicester (7) landed at Southampton (8) an Army levied in France, in Expectation of a general Revolt of the English against the King. Thus Henry saw, in all Parts of his Dominions, hostile Armies, against whom he was wholly unprepared.

Mean while young Henry, who continued at Paris, acted as if he had been sole King of England. He received the Homage of the Vassals: Made Grants and Donations of the Crown-Lands (9): Assigned Pensions out of the publick Revenues, and had his Seal apart (10), as if the King his Father had no more Right to intermeddle in the Government of his Kingdom. He would not keep so much as a single Person about him that did not swear Fealty to him, independent to that due to the old King. The young Prince thought he had taken such sure Measures, that he looked upon the King his Father's Ruin as infallible. The King of France willing to cherish this Belief, affected continually to throw out satirical Jest against old Henry, and would hardly bear he should be called King in his presence. The Truth is, the Ruin of that Monarch seemed to be at hand, since he had so many Enemies to deal with at once. But if he had shown some want of Resolution, in his Quarrel with the Pope, it was otherwise on this Occasion. Never did his Virtues shine with more Lustre, than when he saw himself forced as it were to yield to his Ill-Fortune, and reduced to Extremity. Animated with fresh Courage at the sight of the impending Danger, he managed his Affairs with so much Firmness, Prudence, and Forecast, that in spite of the Obstacles which started up incessantly, and from all Quarters, he obtained in the end a glorious Advantage over all his Enemies. The King of France was obliged to abandon Urmal (11), which cost him a long Siege (12). An Army of Brabant, sent by Henry into Bretagne (13), vanquished Rebels, upon which they returned to their Duty. The Earl of Leicester was defeated in England, and taken Prisoner by Humphrey Bohun (14), General of the English Army, who took the Opportunity of a Truce made with the King of Scotland, to give the Earl Battle (15). As soon as the Truce was expired, William renewed his Ravages in Northumberland. But whilst he was intent upon the Plunder, he unfortunately, or rather imprudently suffered himself to be surprized by the English General, who routed his Army, and took him Prisoner (16). The Scots pretend this was during the Truce; but the English affirm, it was after the Expiration. However it be, the King being fallen into the Hands of the English, was carried first to Richmond Castle, and from thence conveyed into Normandy (17).

Whilst the Arms of Henry were thus crowned with Success in England, he was employed in France in subduing the revolted Cities and Provinces. Tho' he could not be every where, he ordered it so, that in a few Months, either by himself or by his Generals, he became Master of the principal Places in Guienne, Saintonge, Angou, Poitou, and Bretagne. These Successes, quite broke the Measures of his Enemies, and entirely dissipated the Fears he was justly seized with in the beginning of the War (18).

Mean time, the King his Son, perceiving him embarrassed in France, took that Opportunity of raising an Army of Frenchmen and Flemings. As soon as the Troops were ready for Action, he put himself at their Head, and marched towards Gravelin, where he designed to embark. His Project was to pass into England, and join the King of Scotland and Earl of Leicester, who were not yet defeated. Could he have crossed the Sea at that Juncture, he would undoubtedly have been Master of England. But the Wind remained so long contrary, that he could not execute this Project. Whilst he was waiting in vain for a favorable Gale, the King his Father had time to restore his Affairs in France; after which, he embarked at Berfleur, and safely arrived in England. From Southampton, where he landed (19), he proceeded directly to Canterbury, to do Penance at Becket's Tomb; to which he had 1173. obliged himself upon receiving Absolution. When he came in sight of the Town, he alighted, though he was yet three Miles distant, and pulling off his Boots, walked bare-foot in extreme Pain, to the sacred Tomb (1). There, after resting a while, he submitted to the shameful Penance enjoined him. He was scourged by the hands of the Prior and Monks of St. Augustin's (2), and spent the Night in Prayer in the Cathedral, lying on the cold Pavement. On the Morrow, after assisting at a solemn Procession round the Tomb, he departed for London (3). Care was taken, in order to magnify this new Saint's Credit in the Civil Court, to remark, that Henry was indebted for the Victory obtained by his Arms over the King of Scotland, to the Intercession of the blessed St. Thomas (4). It was further affirmed, the King himself was so persuaded of it, that he publicly returned him Thanks, thereby acknowledging he did not in the least question his Sanctity.

After Leicester's and the King of Scotland's Defeat, the young King's Party not daring to keep the Field any longer, retired to their Strong-Holds and Castles. The King's Impatience to see them entirely reduced, suffered him not to make any Stay at London. A few Days after his Arrival, he marched with his Army to besiege the Castles, still in the Hands of his Son's Adherents (5). But the greatest Part surrendered upon his Approach, and the rest held out but a few Days (6). Mean time, the King of France despairing of Assistance from England, after the Defeat of the Confederates, recalled his Troops from Gravelin, and laid Siege to Roan. He was in hopes of being Master of the City before Henry could come to its Relief. But the brave Resistance of the Inhabitants baffled his Designs. Upon the first notice of the Siege, Henry put to Sea (7) with a good Body of Troops, and was so expeditious, that he arrived in Normandy before Lewis had made any great Progress. His sudden coming struck such a Terror into his Enemy, that he raised the Siege (8), and retreated in the utmost Confusion, leaving all his Baggage behind him. Nay, some say, he could not retire but by means of a Treaty (9), of which he afterwards made no account.

Henry's Affairs were then in a more flourishing Condition than ever. Absolute Master in England, he beheld Scotland disheartened by the Imprisonment of her King, Lewis continued in Obedience. The Welsh remained quiet within their own Bounds. Normandy, Cuisme, and the other Provinces beyond Sea, were entirely reduced, except a few Castles in Poitou still in possession of Prince Richard. No wonder therefore Lewis, now above sixty Years of Age, despairing of accomplishing what he had projected in the beginning of the War. He found, the Confederacy, which he thought capable of pulling down Henry, had rather fixed him more firmly in his Throne. On the other hand, he was apprehensive in case he died during the War, Philip his Son, who was but ten Years of Age, would be too much incumbered to maintain it. These Considerations inspired him with a desire to make Peace. Henry was of the same Mind. He ardently wished to deprive his Sons of their only Refuge, the Protection of France. Richard his second Son, a Prince of a fierce and restless Temper, was the only Person that opposed the wish for Peace. But neither his Brothers, nor the King of France, thought proper to continue the War for his sake. They consented therefore to a Truce, during which they obliged themselves to give him no Assistance. Henry his Father improved this Juncture to reduce his obstinate Son to Obedience; who at last, seeing himself destitute of Support, came and threw himself at his Feet, humbly imploring his Pardon. He met with a better Reception than he expected, and attended his Father to the Place, chosen by the two Monarchs to treat in Person of the Terms of Peace. As they both stood at the Head, it was not difficult to settle the Articles. Henry granted a general Pardon to all the Revolters, without any Exception. The young King, his eldest Son, promised to be obedient to the future, and to let Prince John his Brother enjoy the Appenage granted him. Geoffrey and Richard were, or pretended to be, satisfied with what the King their Father allotted them. In fine, the King of France promised to surrender to Henry, what Castles he had taken in the beginning of the War (10). To strengthen the Reconciliation between the two Kings, a Marriage was resolved up on between Richard and Bliss, Daughter of Lewis. The Princess, who was very young, was delivered to Henry the Father, to be educated in England till she was marriageable. But he abused this Trust, as will be seen in the Sequel (11).

It was further agreed by this Treaty, that all the Prisoners on both Sides should be released (12). But in order to exclude the King of Scotland, Henry inserted a Clause, importing, that those whose Ransoms were already treated of, were not to have the Benefit of this Article. Lewis was of this Number, and perhaps the only One among all the Prisoners. His Impatience to be at Liberty caused him to submit to very hard Terms. He was to make Restitution of all he had taken from England, and do Homage for his Kingdom to that Crown. Upon his swearing to perform these Engagements, he was released. As soon as Henry had settled all his Affairs in France (13), he repaired to York (14), attended by the King his Son, and a numerous Train of Nobility (15). Here in the Presence of the Barons of both Realms, William did Homage to the two Kings of England for the Kingdom of Scotland in general, and for the County of Galloway in particular. This Homage was confirmed by the solemn Oaths of the Barons of Scotland, that in case their King should recede from what he had done, they would withdraw their Obedience, and content the Kingdom of Scotland should be put under an Interdict. But as Henry did not altogether rely on these Engagements, William, for his further Security, put into his Hands the Castles of Roxburgh, Berwick, Stirling, and Edinburgh (16). This Affair being ended, the young Henry the King went back to France, where he remained three Years, laying out his Time in improving in all the Exercises of the Body and Mind proper for a Prince.

Peace being restored to England, where it had long been a Stranger, Henry (17) took this opportunity to enact new Laws (18), and revive others that were neglected. Generally the Laws which are for the Advantage of the Sovereigns are very strictly observed, because they themselves see it done; but they are too frequently apt to neglect those that are beneficial to the People. By this means they continually enlarge their Authority. But then it is often the Cause of Rebellions, which sometimes are more prejudicial to Kings, than the Laws they neglect or evade. Henry lately experienced, in a sensible manner, how dangerous it is to deal with a discontented Nation. Moreover, his three Sons, who had improved this Disposition, were still alive and well, and in Appearance, not much altered by his late Peace with them. He thought therefore, in order to prevent them from engaging in a fresh Rebellion, it was his Interest to gain the People's Affection by reviving the Laws of Edward the Confessor. As these Laws were very advantageous for the Subject, in comparison of those of the Norman Kings, which tended solely to the augmenting the Revenues of the Prince, and stretching the Royal Prerogative; both Nobles and People passionately longed for their Re-establishment. They had the future Sovereign. But suffering himself to be guided by the Advice of some young Persons that attended him thither, he so alienated the Hearts of the Irish, that the King was forced at length to recall him (1).

Pope Lucius III. dying this Year, Urban III. his Successor, appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury his Legate in England. Baldwin, a Cistercian Monk, was then Archbishop, having succeeded Richard, who died in 1184 (2).

The Affairs of Ireland created the King little Uneasiness, in comparison of that caused by the violent Temper of his Son Richard. This young Prince having lain quiet ever since his elder Brother's Death (3), was at length weary of a State so little agreeable to his Humour. He had been in Guienne, where he had taken upon him to rule with an absolute Authority, without any Regard to the Orders of the King his Father. In this he was supported by the Gaijans themselves, who chose much rather to have a Sovereign of their own, than depend on the Crown of England. After Richard had laboured some time to gain that Province to his Interests, he went into Poitou, and drawing some Troops together, made War upon the Bretons, who had disdained him. Geoffrey his Brother, who was then in Bretagne, surprized at this unexpected Attack, speedily levied a small Army, and gave him Battle. But as his Forces were inferior in Number, he was easily defeated. Richard would have pursued his Undertaking, if the dread of his Father, who was preparing to come and chastise him (4), had not obliged him to retire into Poitou, where he pretended to stand upon his Defence. In the mean time Henry, perfectly knowing his Son's Temper, which could not be tamed but by Force, had prepared an Army sufficient to take away all his hopes of Resistance. But before he proceeded to Extremities, he sent him Word, it was his absolute Command that he should not concern himself any more with the Affairs of Guienne, which he could not enjoy till after the Death of the Queen his Mother, and upon that Condition, would leave him in possession of Poitou. And if he refused to obey, he would not only compel him to it, but likewise disinherit him of the Crown of England. Richard, terrified at these Threats, and the King's great Preparations, thought fit to comply with his Will. But as this Submission was forced, he was uneasy in his Mind, the Effects of which soon became visible. The Example of William the Conqueror, who preferred his second before his eldest Son, seemed in some Measure to authorize the King thus to threaten Richard. Accordingly the young Prince could not forbear being concerned, in a dread of being supplanted by one of his Brothers. This Consideration made him keep fair with the King his Father, and endeavour to curb his natural Impetuosity. But he was freed in part from his Fears by the Death of his Brother Geoffrey, at Paris, where he was gone to assist at a Tournament (5). This Prince, who had a Daughter called Eleanor (6), left Constance of Bretagne his Wife big with Child, who was quickly after delivered of a Son named Arthur (7).

Henry was very desirous of having the Guardianship of these Infants, for a Pretence to keep Bretagne. With this View he took a Journey thither, in Expectation of obtaining the Consent of the States. But Constance his Daughter-in-law, strongly opposed it. She affirmed, that being Mother of the Children, it belonged to her to take Care of their Education. Moreover, she maintained, they had no Claim to any Thing till after her Death, since their Father was Duke of Bretagne only in her Right. But Henry as Grandfather, pretended to have an unquestionable Title to the Guardianship of his Grandchildren. The States of Bretagne, who were more afraid of his Power than convinced by his Reasons, were in great Perplexity, Justice and their own Interest required, that Constance, to whom the Dutchy belonged by Inheritance, should have the Government. But on the other Hand, it was dangerous to send away the King without some Satisfaction. In short, they found an Expedient with which the King was well enough pleased, because he saw it would be difficult to obtain more. The Dutches was made Guardian of her Children, and it was decreed, That all Orders and publick Acts should run jointly in her's and her Son's Name; but with this Proviso, that nothing of Moment should be transacted, without the Advice and Consent of the King of England. Before he quitted Bretagne, Henry caused the States to swear Fealty to young Arthur as their Sovereign. He was apprehensive, in case Constance should marry again, and have Children by a second Husband, she would prefer them before those by the first.

Henry would not perhaps have been satisfied with what he had obtained of the Bretons, had he not been afraid that Philip King of France, would have interposed in the Affair. This Prince, though very young, was meditating grand Projects. He could not help showing some Uneasiness, that so many Provinces of his Kingdom should be possessed by the English. Since his Accession to the Throne, he had formed a Design to wrest them out of their Hands, and make use, for that purpose, of all opportunities that should offer. Pursuant to this Resolution, he imagined, the Diffusion between Henry and his Son Richard, presented him with a favorable Juncture, which he should not neglect. He was persuaded, these Princes being divided and unarmed, and not suspecting they were going to be attacked, he might very possibly take from them some Part of their Dominions in France. In this Belief, he made extraordinary Preparations, upon such Pretences as served best to conceal the real Motive. As soon as he was ready to act, he summoned Richard to appear and do him Homage for Poitou, and required King Henry to restore the Vexin with all Margaret's Dowry, his eldest Son's Widow. But for this once he found he had taken his Measures wrong. For Henry and Richard uniting for their common Interest, kept him so well employed, one in Normandy, the other in Guienne, that he was forced to sue for a Truce, which was granted him for two Years.

Having experienced how difficult it would be to compass his Ends, unless he fomented the Discord between Henry and Richard, he did not long defer his Endeavours. To succeed the more easily, he ordered it so, that during the Truce, Richard came and paid him a Visit at Paris, where he seemingly gave him a very hearty Welcome, and even admitted him to his Bed. These Careless wrought a sudden Effect in the Mind of the English Prince, who never once suspected the Motive. In a little time he entertained so strong an Affection for Philip, that he imparted to him all his Reasons for being dissatisfied with his Father. Philip improving this openness, pretended to pity him, and have his Interest very much at Heart. He wondered with him, that the King his Father should treat him so harshly, and after crowning his elder Brother in a less advanced Age, should refuse him the same Favour. He artfully hinted, there was reason to fear, he had formed a design to place on the Throne his youngest Son John, of whom he was very fond. From these Considerations it was natural to infer, a Necessity of taking Care to prevent so unjust a Proceeding. Richard received these Marks of Affection with that Earnestness and Confidence, that Philip was in great hopes of attaining his Ends.

Mean time, Richard's long stay at Paris made his Father extremely uneasy (8), who never ceased fending for him (9). He was quickly sensible, his Suspensions were not groundless. At the time the Truce was about to expire, Richard, without quitting the Court of France, openly complained of his Father's preventing him from consummating his Marriage with the Princess designed for his Wife (10). But as Henry might recall him on pretence of solemnizing the Nuptials, he had another Excuse ready. He pretended to have private Intelligence that the King designed to apprehend him, and keep him in Custody, in order to place with the more Ease his younger Son on the Throne. These Proceedings of Richard threw Henry into great Perplexity. He perceived, this Affair might be attended with ill Consequences, unless a means was found to draw his Son from Philip. But this was no easy Matter, if Richard himself was unwilling. As the main Business therefore was to gain his Son, he privately dispatched a trusty Messenger, who made him sensible, he had imprudently fallen into the King of France's Snare, whose sole Aim was to sow Dissention between him and his Father, in order to make an Advantage of their Misunderstanding. Richard being prevailed upon by these Remonstrances, suddenly left the Court of France, and returned to the King.

1187. The Truce being expired, the two Monarchs took up Arms again. But as they were renewing the Hostilities, their Animosity was suspended for a while, upon the melancholy News that the City of Jerusalem was taken by Saladin Sultan of Babylon, and that Guy de Lusignan, the last that swayed the Sceptre of that Kingdom, was in the Hands of the Infidels. As the Union of the Christians had formerly been the means of conquering the Kingdom of Jerusalem, their Disunion was the Cause of its Detraction, after subsisting near a whole Century. This News, which threw the Princess of France into great Consternation, was particularly fatal to Pope Urban III, who died with Grief. He was soon followed by Gregory VIII, his Successor, who sitting in the Papal Chair but three Months, made Room by his Death for Clement III.

The two Kings of France and England were very sensibly affected with the Christians late Loss in the East. Their Zeal being rous'd upon that occasion, they resolv'd, with one Consent, to drop their private Quarrel for the Cause of God (for so it was term'd in those Days) and meet at Gisors (1), to consider of means to remedy this Misfortune. At this Interview, their first Business was to renew the Truce. Then the two Monarchs, as well as the Earl of Flanders, who was present at the Conference, took the Cross, distinguishing themselves by three different Colours. Philip chose a Red, Henry a White, and the Earl of Flanders a Grey, Cross. Those of their Subjects that engaged in the Crusade imitated them in this Distinction of Colours (2).

But the Zeal shown by the two Kings was not long-lived. Their Ardour soon gave place to an Animosity so much the more surprising, as the occasion was of little moment. Prince Richard, who was to be in the Expedition to the Holy Land, having occasion for a Sum of Money, came to Poitiers to raise it. While he was employed in this Matter, one of Raymond, Earl of Toulouse's Officers, passing through his Territories, and giving him some cause of Displeasure, he committed him to Prison. Raymond being apprized of it, ordered, by way of Reprisal, two Poitiers Gentlemen to be taken up, as they were going by Toulouse, in their return from a Pilgrimage to St. James of Compostella. These violent Proceedings causing a very warm Quarrel between the two Princes, Richard took occasion to revive the Pretensions of the House of Poitiers to the Earldom of Toulouse. This furnished him with a Pretence to enter Earl Raymond's Country with a powerful Army, where he became Master of Moulins, and several other Places. Raymond finding himself thus engaged in a War, of which he could not question but the King of England was the Author, demanded the Assistance of France. Though Philip knew better than the Earl of Toulouse, and was very sensible, Richard might possibly undertake the War without his Father's Knowledge, he pretended to believe it done by Henry's Orders. Accordingly, under colour of assisting the Earl of Toulouse his Vassal, he made a Division of Burgundy, and took London. This was the occasion of the fierce Rupture between the two Kings, when they seemed to breathe nothing but Death and Destruction against the Infidels (3).

The beginning of this War not being remarkable, it will be needless to relate the Particulars. It is sufficient to take notice of the Consequences, which proved very fatal to the King of England. While it was vigorously prosecuted on both sides, all on a sudden, and when Henry least expected it, his Son Richard left him, and went to the King of France. Very probably, this was effected by Philip's Intuitions, which the Historians have not taken care to mention. Be this as it will, Richard pretended to have two occasions of Complaint against the King his Father. The first was, That he detained from him the Princess Anne, and had offered Philip, who press'd him to have the Nuptials solemnized, to marry her to Prince John upon less advantageous Terms. Whether this was true, or Philip had told him a Falshood to set him at variance with Henry, he believed, or he'd to believe, that a Project was formed to deprive him of his Birth-right, and place his younger Brother on the Throne. The other occasion of Complaint was, That Philip offering to consent to a Truce, Henry refused it, affirming it was better to conclude a Peace, and adjust their respective Pretensions, before they engaged in their Expedition to the Holy Land. This displeased Richard, and his Reason was, because, by a Peace, he would have been obliged to restore his Conquest upon the Earl of Toulouse, whereas by a Truce he would have kept possession.

As much as Richard's Defection disquieted the King his Father, so much did it rejoice Philip, who, from that time had a great Advantage over his Enemy. In withdrawing, Richard set against the King part of his Provinces in France, and thereby almost enabled him to maintain the War. For this reason Henry hastened to the utmost of his Power, the Conclusion of the Peace. But Philip proposed such hard Terms, that they could not be accepted. He required, that the Marriage between Richard and Anne should be consummated, and the Prince crowned before his Father's Death, that his Right to the Crown might not be disputed for the future. Henry could not relish these Conditions. His Love for Anne would not suffer him to see her in the Arms of another, and perhaps there were very strong Reasons against his giving her to his Son. On the other hand, he had experienced to his Cost the ill Consequences of crowning his eldest Son Henry, to be willing to run the same hazard for one who seem'd no less dangerous than his Brother. This first Attempt failing, Henry made another Effort (4) for a Peace, but found that Philip, grown more untractable, added a new Article. He demanded that Henry should carry Prince John to the Holy Land, left in Richard's Absence he should seize the Crown in case his Father died at the Expedition. Henry officiated at Philip's Interposing this in his Family Affairs, broke off the Negotiation. This Rupture confirmed Richard in his Suspicion that his Father intended to deprive him of the Crown, and give it to his younger Brother.

All hopes of Peace vanishing (5), Philip received Richard's Homage for all the Provinces in France belonging to the Crown of England, pretending Henry had incurred the Guilt of Rebellion, in warring against his Sovereign.

This Step being taken, the Effusion of Christian Blood was renewed with greater Fury than ever, and the Zeal express'd against the Infidels sensibly cooled. Henry lay under a great Disadvantage in this War (6). Most of his Subjects in France, had abandoned him and joined with his Son. This Revolt was so general, that keeping his Christenings at Saumur, he had the Mortification to see himself attended but with three or four Nobles. His Vexation was further increased by the ill Success of the following Campaign. His Troops, every where defeated, were at length reduced to so small a Number, that it was not in his Power to continue the War. His Affairs being in this wretched Condition, he desired the Pope to interpose his Authority, and procure a Peace. But this Method proved ineffectual. Indeed, the Pope sent Legates into France, who threatened Philip with Excommunication in case he prevented the King of England from accomplishing his Vow. But these Menaces had not the expected Effect. The French Monarch fiercely reject'd the Pope and no right to intermeddle in the Affairs of the Kingdom, especially when the Business in hand was the chastising a Vassal who had audaciously taken up Arms against him. Adding, with an insulting Air, He did not question but that the Soul of the King of England, Sturges made the Legates talk in that Strain (8). Henry deading the Consequences of so unfortunate a War, and finding the Pope could do him no Service, was forced at length to agree to the Terms, Philip was pleas'd to impose upon him, the principal of which were these (9):

That all Henry's Subjects, as well English as French, should swear Fidelity to Richard; and that those who had sided with the Son, should not return to the Father till within one Month before he set out for the Holy Land.

That the two Kings, with Prince Richard, should meet at Vezelay in le Normans, in order to begin their Journey.

That all the King of England's Subjects should have free Passage all over France, paying only the old Customs.

1189. That Henry should be obliged to pay the King of France twenty thousand Marks, for the Damages sustained in the War (1).

That all the Barons of the King of England should swear that in case he violated the Treaty, they would assist the King of France against him.

That the Cities of Tours and Mans should remain in the Hands of Philip, till the King of England performed all these Articles.

It was with a supreme Reluctancy that a Prince of so high a Spirit as Henry, stooped to such hard Conditions. The Remembrance of the Advantages, he had all along obtained over France before this fatal War, instead of comforting him, served only to render his Cup the more bitter. Upon this Mortification followed another, when he could not resist. He discovered, that during the late War, his beloved Son John held Intelligence with Philip, and was concerned in all his Brother's Plots to dethrone a Father who ever shown a tender Affection for him. His Grief threw him into a violent a Passion (2), that he cursed the Day of his Birth, and uttered Imprecations against his Sons, which the Bishops then present could never bring him to revoke. Shortly after, he fell sick at Chinon, and perceiving his End was at hand, cursed himself to be carried into the Church before the Altar, where after confessing himself, and expressing some Signs of Repentance, he expired. His Eyes were no longer closed but his Domes-ticks all left him, nay some had even the Impudence to strip him and leave him quite naked in the Church. His Corpse was removed to Tours, where he was buried according to Custom (3). An extraordinary Accident retarded this Removal of his Body very remarkable. His Son Rich. coming to meet the Funeral Pump, in order to accompany his Father to his Grave; upon his Approach, the Crowd in great Abundance rushed out of the Church and Nostrils of the Corpse. Ricard, though naturally very hard-hearted, was moved at this Sight, that he burst out into Tears, and openly accused himself of being the Occasion of his Father's Death.

Such was the end of Henry II. one of the most illustrious Princes of his time, both for Greatness of Genius and Extent of Domains. The Mixture of Vices and Virtues, in this Monarch, makes it difficult to give him a general Character that perfectly agrees with him. He was valiant, prudent, generous, politic, studious, learned, and of an exalted Genius (4). On the other hand, he was excessive haughty, of an insupportable Ambition (5), and a boundless Lust. Never satisfied with Love or Empire, he spent his whole Life in pursuit of new Conquests in both. He attempted the Conquity of all that came in his way, or excepting the Prince, designed for his own Son (6): all which in a great Measure balance all his noble Endownments. In the beginning of his Reign, which was one of the happiest for nine Years, there was not in Europe a King more feared or respected. Encircled with Glory and Honour, which seemed to promise him great Prosperity, he was looked upon as the happiest Prince in the World, before Becket's Affair interrupted his Fidelity. But that fatal Quarrel, which created him so many Troubles, being followed by Diffentions in his Family, he beheld the Happiness, which till then had attended him turned into Misfortunes. However, if this Prince was unhappy, his Misfortunes fell only on his own Head and not on his Kingdom, which had never been in so flourishing Condition as in his Reign. By his Accession to the Crown, England became one of the most powerful States in Europe, and began from that time to be on a level with France, to which before it was very much inferior. Besides the large and rich Provinces annexed in his time to the English Monarchy, the Conquest of Ireland in his time gives a great Lustre to his Reign, and ought to render his Memory dear to the English. He died on the 6th of July in 1180, and in the 57th Year of his Age, after a Reign of thirty four Years, eight Months and twelve Days (&c).

Of the five Sons, he had by Eleanor of Guenee 13 H. 1. 1. 1. 1.
Wife (8), Richard and John only survived him: But Geoffrey, of whom Henry, his third Son, left a Son and a Daughter, of whom I shall have Occasion to speak hereafter. Matilla, his eldest Daughter, married to the Duke of Savoy (9) died immediately after him. Eleanor was Wife to Alfred King of Cephell, and Johanna to William II. funancee the Good, King of Sicily.

Besides his lawful Wife, Henry had two natural Sons by H. wife Rogmond Clifford; William, named Long-wor, who was Earl of Salisbury; and Gessie, who was Arch-bishop of York. By a Daughter of sir Ralph Bleunt, Henry had also another natural Son called Mowson, who being elected Bishop of Durham, could not obtain the Pope's Confirmation, because he refused to take the Name of his Mother's father.

Some Historians relate, that in the Reign of Henry II. there was found in the Church Yard of Gloucest'ry Abbey, a Grave containing three Bodies laid of a woman another, each in a Coffin by it self. It was pretended, the first was Ginevieve, second Wife of the Great Arthur; the second, Melioris his Nephew; and the third, Arthur himself, diffing affixed by a leaden Cross, with two in Inscription: Here lies the illustrious King Arthur in the Year of our Lord &c. What is further asserted, that his Legs were a third longer than those of the largest Men, and that there was the Distance of a Span between his Elbows and his side, this Relation somewhat suspicious. However this Discovery, real or pretended, served to undecore some wretched People among the Welsh, who still expected the Return of their Heroe.

AS soon as Henry was laid in his Grave, Richard's Complaints were easily perceived to be only Pretences to colour his Rebellion. He had earnestly desired Leave to consummate his Marriage with Alice of France, and complained of the King his Father's great Injustice in obstructing his Happiness. And yet, when this pretended Happiness was in his Power, he thought no more of it. On the other hand, his Jealousies and Fears, on account of Prince John his Brother, vanished on a sudden. Instead of returning forthwith into England, as he would certainly have done, had he been apprehensive of his Brother's Cabals, he staid above a Month in France (1), after Henry's Death, without having the least Uneasiness on that Score. His first Care was to do Homage to Philip, and thank him withal for the Protection he had granted him. This Visit procured him the Restitution of the Places conquered by that Monarch during the late War (2). After that, he went and received the Ducal Crown of Normandy at Rouen (3), where he remained some time, showing by that he was not afraid his Absence might prejudice his Affairs in England. And indeed, so far were the English from disputing his Right to the Crown, that his Orders were executed as if he had already received it. The first he sent thither was to release his Mother Queen Eleanor, who languished in Prison sixteen Years. At the same time he entrusted her with the Administration of the Government during his Absence, and empowered her to release what Prisoners she pleased (4). The Queen, being taught by her own, to pity others Misfortunes, used with Pleasure, for the Relief

she was observed, during the Residue of her Life, to omit no Opportunity of exercising her Charity to such as were debarred the Sweets of Liberty, the Value of which she had but too well learnt, during her long Confinement.

Elizabet's Confession for Prisoners was very natural, But Richard's Treatment of those that had, for his sake, exposed themselves to his Father's Repentment was very surprising (5). Instead of rewarding them, as they expected, he forbid them ever to appear in his Presence. At the same time he affected to load with Favours all that had repented his Solicitations. Hence was seen, an Instance of what has been often remarked, that such as make use of indirect Means to compass their Ends, defeat in their Hearts the Instruments they employ, and approve of the Conduct of those that are not to be diverted from their Duty.

After Richard had fettered all his Affairs in France, he came to Richard (5), where he was solemnly crowned (7) by Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, who administered to him the customary Oath (8). From William the Conqueror, there was no King but what had taken the same Oath; though not one had been careful to perform it. This the Archbishop took the Freedom to reprove to Richard, conjuring him withal, in the Name of God, to be mindful of the Vows and Oaths, he had just taken in accepting the Royal Dignity. Richard made Answer, that by God's Assistance he would punctually perform them all (9).

The Ceremony of the Coronation was somewhat disturbed by the Malice of some Jews, who by striving too eagerly to get into the Church to see the Solemnity (1), gave occasion to the People to fall upon them and kill several before their Fury could be restrained. But the Authors of this Disorder were not suffered to go unpunished. The King ordering strict Inquisition to be made, the chief Ring-Leaders were desperately put to Death (2).

It is no wonder, the People should fall on the Jews upon so slight an occasion. Since the News of the taking of Jerusalem was spread over Europe, nothing but Vengeance was breathed against the Enemies of Christ. Though the Jews were not concerned in the late Revolution in the East, their not being Christians was sufficient to render them odious. At such a Juncture, they would doubtless have found themselves expoted to worse Persecutions, if the Preparations for the Crusade, had not at length turned the Fury of the People against the Saracens. This Zeal, especially in France and England, ran so high, that the Number of the Ungates was prodigious. Every one gloried, either in lifting himself to go in Person against the Infidels, or in advancing Money for the War. Richard bound himself by the like Vow before his Father's Death. He renewed his Engagement at the late Interview between him and Philip, where these two Monarchs agreed to join their Forces, and go to the Assistance of the Christians of Palestine. Richard was scarce on the Throne, when, for fear of forgetting his Promise, Philip sent to put him in mind of it (3). There was no need to use much Solicitation to incline him to that undertaking. Far from desiring to be excused, he thought only of Preparations for his Journey, neglecting for its sake all his other Affairs. Whether this proceeded from a pure Principle of Zeal and Devotion, or from an eager desire of acquiring Fame, I dare not determine. However, if it be allowable to judge by the Character of Richard, it is to be presumed Glory had a greater share in it than Religion.

As this Prince had grand Views, and intended to lead a powerful Army into Palestine, it was necessary to raise vast Sums for its Maintenance. Accordingly, he was wholly intent upon that, till the Time came to begin his Voyage. The late King left in his Coffers above a hundred thousand Marks (4), and Richard drew little less from the Treasurer and others, who managed the Revenues in the late Reign. But thinking these Sums insufficient for the Charges of his Voyage, he used all manner of ways to increase them. He sold almost all the Crown-Lands to such as would purchase them. The Bishops and Abbots having the most ready Money, made a greater Advantage of this opportunity than others. The Bishop of Durham purchased the Earldom of Northumberland for himself and Successors (5); upon which the King jestingly said, He had made a young Earl of an old Bishop (6). But this new Dignity was not capable of satisfying the Prelate's Ambition; He gave moreover one thousand Marks to be Justiciary during the King's Absence (7). As Richard evidently appeared to be unwilling to omit any means that might procure him ready Money, to defray the Expenses of his intended Voyage, the King of Scotland thought he should improve this opportunity (8). To that purpose, he offered him ten thousand Marks to deliver up Berwick and Roxborough, and desist from his Claim to the Sovereignty of Scotland. Richard, very readily accepting the offer, gave up the two Places, and by authentick Charter, discharged the King of Scotland, and his Successors, from the Homage extorted from him by Henry II.

Many People were uneasy at these Alienations. Nay, Richard of some took the Liberty to reprehend to the King the ill Consequences thereof. But he stopped their Mouths with this Reply, I would sell London itself could I meet with a Chapman able to purchase it. The Sums amassed by these extraordinary ways, not answering yet to the vastness of his Projects, he bethought himself of a new Expedient to augment them. As Multitudes had hastily and unadvisedly engaged in the Crusade, he obtained of the Pope a Power to dispense with such as repented of their Vow (9), by which means he raised very great Sums. After practising these general Methods, he proceeded to exact Money from the richest of his Subjects. He borrowed of those who led an unblameable Life. But for such as gave him any handle, he threatened to call them to a strict Account (10), and forced them to prevent it by Presents. Richard of some took the Liberty to reprehend to the King the ill Consequences thereof. golden Candlestick, with a Taper; after whom came Goffrey de Lucy, bearing the Royal Cap, and Jehan the Marshal came, with a rusty pair of Gold Spurs; Then William Earl of Pembroke, with the Royal Sceptre. After him William Fitz Patrick, Earl of Salisbury, with a golden Rod, his right Hand on the Top; Then three other Earls, David, Brother to the King of Scotland, as Earl of Huntingdon; Prince Jahn, E. of Lancaster and Leicester; and Robert Earl of Leicester, each bearing a Sword upon the Scabbards richly adorned with Gold; After them, six Earls and Barons bearing a crooked Tangle, on which were laid the Royal Robes, and other Regalia. Then came William Maudslayi, Earl of Gloucester and Exeter, carrying a large Crown of Gold, set with precious Stones. Then Duke Richard himself, (between the Bishops of Durham and Bath) over whom a Canopy of State was born by four Barons: Then followed a great Train of Earls, Barons, Knights, &c. In this Order he came into the Church, where before the high Altar, laying his Hand on the Evangelists and Relicks of Saints, he took a solemn Oath. That he would observe Peace, Honour, and Reverence to Almighty God, his Church, and his Ministers, all the Days of his Life; That he would execute upright Justice and Equity towards the People committed to him; That he would abrogate and annul all evil Laws and wrongful Customs, and in like Manner keep and sincerely maintain those that were good; and laudable. Then they put off all his Garments, from his middle upwards, except his Shirt, which was open on the Shoulders, and put on his Shoes, which were of gold Tiffes, and the Archbishop anointed him on the Head, the Breast, and the Arms; then covering his Head with a Linnen Cloth, he set the Crown thereon which Goffrey de Lucy carried; and when he had put on his Waistcoat, and on that his Dumetate, or Upper Garment, the Archbishop delivered to him the Sword of the Kingdom; which done, two Earls put on his Spurs, and he was led, with the Royal Mantle hung on him, to the Altar, where the Archbishop charged him on God's Behalf, Not to presume to take upon him this Dignity, except he rejected unavailingly to keep the Peace and Oaths he had just then made. To which the King answered, That by God's Grace he would faithfully perform them all. Then the Crown was taken from before the Altar and given to the Archbishop, who set it upon the King's Head, delivering the Sceptre into his Right-hand, and the Rod Royal into his Left. Thus crowned, he went back to his Throne with the same Solemnity as before. Then Mass began, and when they came to the Offertory, the King was led by the Bishops of Durham and Bath to the Altar, where he offered a Mass of pure Gold, as his Predecessors were wont to do, and afterwards was brought back to his Throne by the same Bishops. After Mass, he was attended, thus royally arrayed, to a Chamber adjoining in like Proportion as before: Where (after a short Repose) he with the same Procession returned into the Choir; and having put off his heavy Crown and Robes, he went to Dinner. After the Coronation-Fest, which was kept in Westminster-Hall, the Citizens of London were his Butlers, and those of Winchester served up the Meat. Then the Archbishops and Bishops sat down with the King, whilst the Earls and Barons served in the King's Palace, as their Places and Dignities required. Howd. p. 666. Diet. p. 647. Ralph de Diceto (who was then Dean of St. Paul's, and in the Vicinity of the Bishopric of London, assisted at the Coronation, and delivered the Chorin, or consecrated Oil, with which the King was anointed) has thus remarkably went full before his Account of the Coronation: "Richard Earl of Paris, being by hereditary Right to be made King, promoued in regem after a solemn and due Election by the Clergy and Laity, took a three-fold Oath, &c." By which words it should seem that the Kings in those Days were not crowned as completely Kings, till they were actually crowned, though the Custom be otherwise now. Diet. ibid.

(2) The Example of the Lancians was followed the next Year in the Towns of Norwich, on February 6; Stamford, March 7; St. Edmundsbury, March 18; Lincoln and Lyons, where the Rabble rose upon the Jews; but their greatest Fury was exerted against them at York, March 16, where five hundred Men, besides Women and Children, having prevailed with the Governor to let them into the Castle to avoid the Rage of the People; the High-Sheriff came and required them to deliver it up, which they refusing to do, the People drew up in a Body and attacked the Castle. At last the Jews offered a great Sum of Money to go off with their Lives; but the People desired to give them quarter. Upon which, an ancient Rabbin proposed the killing themselves rather than fall into the Hands of the unmerciful Christian. This Motion was unanimously agreed to, and their Method in putting them through Resolve in Execution, was that: Every Master of a Family cut his Wife's and Childrens Throats first, then dispatched his Servants, and concluded with the Slaughter of himself. Will. of Newburgh, l. 4. c. 9. Diet. p. 651. Brompt. p. 1171. &c. It is strange (Isis Tyrrel, Vol. II. p. 472) to observe the perpetration of a Zeal of some of our Modern Writers, who do not only excuse but applaud this Barbarity, because (Isis Tyrrel) it served to deliver the Enemies of the Christian Faith.

(12) This was Ralph de Glouville, whom Henry II made Justiciary of all England, and who lately resigned that Office. Cicero Leprieux (Isis Henrici) counts first Isis Henrici as a great evil; and after what he says of the Laws of Edward the Confessor, and William I., he is the first that has ever been brought into any regular Form before his Time. The Book that now carries his Name has kept the same Title in its several Editions, viz. Tractatus de Legibus & Consuetudinibus Regni Anglie, tempore Regis Henrici II. conscriptus, &c. In which we have Terms of such Writs as were then (and are mostly still) in use, upon all the several occasions there treated on. He is said to be the inventor of the famous Writ of Assize, or de novel Dispositio. He died in his Voyage to the Holy-Land, being very aged.

(13) Three thousand Pounds.

1189. no Penances but what tended to promote the grand Design of recovering the Holy-Land. By these Means the Army soon became very numerous, and so much better provided with all Things, as there was not an Officer or common Soldier but what furnished themselves with Necessaries.

Amidst the King's Satisfaction to see the Preparations for his Voyage in such forwardness, there was one Thing that gave him disquiet. As he should probably be long absent, he was apprehensive, his Brother might take Advantage of his Absence and seize the Crown. He would fain have carried him along with him. But as John shewed no Inclination for the Voyage, he would not compel him to make an involuntary Vow. To free himself from this Perplexity, he resolved to load with Favours the young Prince, whose Ambition was not yet known to him. He imagined the Grants he should make him would engage him to a grateful Return. Accordingly he invested him with six Earldoms (1), Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaster (2), and gave him to Wife an Heiress of the House of Gloucester. The Archbishop of Canterbury forbade the Marriage, by reason of their being too near a kin (3). But there was a sort of Necessity for it. The late Earl of Gloucester, Father of Avais, for Reasons unknown, made Prince John his Heir. This Settlement would infallibly have caused a great Law-suit, in which there was danger of the Prince's being cast, and from thence taking occasion to raise Disturbances. The Death of his Wife, Daughter of the Earl of Mortagne (4), made the King easy in that respect. By her death a very natural way offered of reconciling the two Parties, by joining them in Marriage. And therefore, the Archbishop's Prohibition, though founded on the Canons, gave place for once to Reasons of State (5), and John became also Earl of Gloucester in Right of Avais his Wife (6). Mean time, tho' Richard had, in a manner, shared his Kingdom with his Brother, he would not suffer him to have any hand in the Government during his Absence, lest he should make him too powerful. Nay, led by this Fear, he caused him to swear to go and remain in Normandy; but before his Departure, released him from his Oath. To Longchamp his Favourite he committed the Regency (7), jointly with the Bishop of Durham (8). Longchamp was a Norman of mean Extraction, who, by his Interest with the King, was become Bishop of Ely, High-Chancellor, and the Pope's Legate over all England. All these Dignities, together with the Regency, rendered him the most powerful Subject that had ever been in England. A Historian therefore very justly gives him the Titles of Prince and Pontiff of the English, since all the Power, Spiritual and Temporal, was united in his Person.

After Richard had taken all necessary Care for the Government of the State, he was willing to secure its Tranquillity, by renewing his Alliance with the Kings of Scotland and Wales. To that end, he desired these two Princes to come into England in order to adjust every Thing that might occasion Disputes; and thereby take from them all Pretence of disturbing the Peace of his Subjects. The former (9), who had reason to be satisfied, made a strict Alliance with him, and as some affirm, sent his Brother David to attend him in his Voyage with a thousand Scotchmen. Griffin King of Wales sent into England his eldest Son Rees, but some Difference in Point of Ceremony arising, that Prince returned without seeing the King (10). However, as Richard was with the High were of no great Moment, that Accident caused him not to delay his Voyage (11).

Every thing being ready for his Departure, Richard passed into France (12) with all his Troops and marched to Marfelles, where his Fleet had orders to expect him. The two Armies of France and England joined at Levancy, according to Agreement. As soon as the two Kings arrived there, they renewed their Alliance, and engaged themselves, to protect and defend one another upon all occasions. They agreed moreover, that all Quarrels, in which their Absence brought their Subjects should be suspended till their Return. The Bishops that attended them thus far, promised to excommunicate all that should attempt to disturb the Peace of the two Kingdoms. After the two Monarchs had concerted whatever was thought necessary to accomplish their Designs (13), they marched together as far as Lyon (14), where they parted. Philip took the St. Remy to Genoa, and Richard to Marfelles (15), where he was to meet his Fleet. But he waited there some time (16) to no purpose. A violent Storm had dispersed his Ships, that they were not yet able to rejoin. Nay, part being driven by Stretches of Weather into Portugal, the King of that Country made use of the Assistance sent him by Providence, to relieve the City of Santarem, besieged by the Miramlin [or Emperor] of Africa. These hindrances preventing the Fleet from arriving at Marfelles by the time the King expected, he could not prevail with himself to wait any longer. Impatient to be at Messina, the general Rendezvous of the Croisades, he hired some Vessels (17) at Marfelles, and embarking part of his Troops, set sail for Sicily. Some Accident obliging him to come to an Anchor at the Mouth of the Tiber, the Pope sent the Bishop of Osia to invite him to come and refresh himself a few Days at Rome; but he refused the Invitation. Presently after he had the Satisfaction to see his Fleet arrive (18) with the rest of the Army, and continuing his Course to Messina, arrived there the 20th of September (19). The sight of so great an Armament caused no less Admiration in the Sicilians than jealousy in the King of France, who was vexed to see the Forces of his Vassal superior to his own. As the Stay these two Monarchs made in Sicily occasioned some remarkable Events, it will be necessary, for the greater Perspicuity, to shew whence they sprung.

Tancred, who then reigned in Sicily, was natural Son of King Roger, who left Isis, Wilhelm, surnamed the Good, Bad, and Constantia, a Nun at Palermo. To William the Good, succeeded his Son William the Good, who marrying Jeanne of England, Sister of Richard, died without Heirs. After his Death, Pope Clement III, who sat then in the Papal Chair, pretended that Sicily, as a Fief of the Church, was devolved to the Holy See. Mean time, Tancred the Bastard found means to get himself elected, on pretence that Sicily now wanted a King to defend her against the Saracens, that were possessed of Part of the Island. Clement dying in the mean time, Celestine III, his Successor, kept up the same Pretensions, and treating Tancred as Usurper, resolved to exert his utmost to wrest the Crown from him. But perceiving he could not execute this Design alone, he applied to the Emperor Henry VI, of the House of Swabia, and gave him the Kingdom of Sicily, in case he could conquer it. To add another Right to that of Donation, he caused the Prin-

(14) At Levancy King Richard made some very remarkable Orders for the preserving Peace in the Navy, during the 7th of his Expedition, viz. That no one should kill a Man in a Ship, he was to be bound to the Mast, and hung in the Sea. If any one was convicted of this, he was to be hanged in the Sea. If any one struck another with his open Hand, without Licence of the King, he was to be whipped three times over Head and Ears in the Sea. If any one gave his Companion apprehensions Langour, to utter a word as he was to give him, to be whipped three times over Head and Ears in the Sea. 1191. usurped the supreme Power, and assumed the Title of Emperor. He was a covetous and brutish Man, that by his continual Cruelties and Extortions had incurred the Hatred of his Subjects; but they durst not openly shew it. They waited for a favorable Opportunity to free themselves from his Tyranny, which his own Avarice, and the Arrival of the English Fleet furnished them with, sooner than they expected. This inhuman Prince, instead of assisting the English that were stranded near the Port of Limisso, imprisoned those that escaped, and seized their Effects. He would not so much as suffer the Ship, which had the Princesses on board, to enter the Harbour, but was so cruel as to leave them exposed to the Wind and Seas. The Fleet, which had been separated, joining again on the Coast of Cyprus, Richard heard with extreme Indignation, Isaac's Barbarity to the English. However, not to retard his Voyage, he was contented with demanding the Prisoners, and what had been seized. The insulting Answer received making him take other Resolutions, he made a Descent in the Isle. The Attack was so furious, that Isaac was forced to abandon the Shore, after seeing a great Slaughter of his Troops. The English, improving this Advantage, went directly and assaulted the City of Limisso, which was carried by the first Attack, and Isaac's with his only Daughter, made Prisoners (1). A few Days after, the pretended Emperor found means to escape, but as none would harbour him, he chose to surrender voluntarily to the King of England, whom he earnestly besought not to put him in Irons. Richard, insinuating over his Misfortune, granted his Request in a liberal Sense, by commanding him to be bound with Silver Fetters (2).

The taking of Limisso, inspiring Richard with the Thought of subduing the whole Island of Cyprus, he met with few Difficulties in that Undertaking. The Cypriots were so pleased to find themselves freed from their Tyrant, that, without making any Resistance, they submitted to a Prince whom they looked upon as their Deliverer, and who confirmed to them all the Privileges enjoyed under the Emperors of Constantinople. During his Stay in the Island, arrived Guy of Lusignan King of Jerusalem, who had obtained his Liberty by the surrender of the City of Acre to the Sultan. Geoffrey his Brother, Raymond of Antioch, Boamond his Son, and other Princes and Lords of Palestine, attended the dispossessed King, who was come to implore the King of England's Protection: Here it was also, that Richard consummated his Marriage with Beren-guella (3), as some have affirmed. Before he left Cyprus, he sent Isaac his Prisoner to Tripoli in Syria, to be confined there, but for his Daughter she was to go with him to Palestine. His regard for that beautiful Princess, gave Occasion to suspect, that Compassion was not the sole Motive of his keeping her near him. This Suspicion was confirmed, when he was seen to cool by degrees in his Affection to his new Queen. But these are Particulars more proper for a Romance than a History.

Whilst Richard's Affairs were so successful abroad, England began to suffer by his Absence. He had no sooner crossed the Sea, but the two Regents disagreeing, came at length, after several Disputes, to an open Rupture. Long- champ had a great Advantage over his Collegues (4), as well by the high Posts he enjoyed, as by his Abilities, which gave him a Superiority, he knew how to improve. By pretending, their Diffidence was very prejudicial to the Affairs of the State, he found means to exclude him by Degrees from the Administration, and assume the whole Power to himself (5). Such an Arbitrary Act might have been coloured with the necessity of the King's Service, had it been done by one of another Character. But Long-champ was known to be proud and imperious, and of a boundless Ambition, which made him look upon all his Dignities, how high soever they were, as below his Deserts. He affected to appear in publick with a Retinue more numerous and splendid than a King's. This excessive Magnificence made an Historian say, that when he lodged but one single Night in a Monastery, he consumed three Years Revenue (6). He treated all Persons with an intolerable Insolence, using his Power with a Haughtiness scarce to be born in a crowned Head (7). Besides, he was a Norman, and exceeding partial to the Foreigners; Qualities which alone were sufficient to render him odious to the English. The dispossessed Bishop writ to the King, who receiving his Complaints at Marfai, sent him his Letters Patents appointing him Juticiary from the Hum-ber to the Confines of Scotland. The Letters being arrived, the Bishop was so unwise as to give them into Long-champ's Hands, who under colour of examining them, refused to restore them, and thereby rendered them of no Effect. To this imperious Act he added a no less bold Enterprize: He ordered the Bishop to be apprehended, and detained him in Prison till he had delivered certain Castles (8), which gave him too great Power in the northern Parts.

Richard had appointed six Lords for Counsellors to the Regents (9). But Longchamp, who was not willing to be advised by any Person whatever, never communicated any Affairs to these Lords. On the contrary, he affected to treat them with extreme Contempt (10). These arbitrary Proceedings obliged at length the Bishop of Durham and the six Counsellors to carry their Complaints to Prince John, who had still the Title of Earl of Mortagne, which he bore during his first Marriage. The young Prince readily promised them his Protection, being glad, their discontent afforded him an Opportunity and Pretence to interfere in the Administration, from which he thought himself unjustly debarred. From that time improving the Disaffection of most of the great Men, with regard to the Regent, he managed them to dexterously that each promised to second him, and the Downfall of Longchamp was resolved. There was nothing wanting but a Pretence, which quickly after offered.

Some time before Richard's Departure to the Holy-Land, Geoffrey, his Bastard Brother, was elected Archbishop of York. Whether his Consent was not asked (11), or he designed that Dignity for another, this Election was displeasing to the King (12). In his Passion with Geoffrey, he was going to order him into Custody (13). However, upon Geoffrey's protesting, he did not intend to inflict upon his Election, he pardoned him, on condition he would never apply to the Pope for his Confirmation. Moreover, he enjoined him, on Pain of his Displeasure, to remain in

(1) They were not then made Prisoners. Isaac having entamped about five Miles from Limisso, Richard came upon him unawares, whilst his Men were asleep, but Isaac escaped naked, leaving all his Riches behind him, particularly his fine Standard, which Richard presented to the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury. The next Day Isaac came and made Peace with Richard, the Terms of which see in Brompton, p. 1199, 57. But the Sultan, that has been set to watch him, falling asleep, he escaped, and hid himself in an Abbey. (10) Among other Instances of his Insolence, Gerard de Camville having brought of King Richard the Government of the Castle of Lincoln, and of the Country adjoining, Longchamp ordered him to resign it to him. Which Camville refusing to do, Longchamp went about to smother him secretly by force, and besieged the Castle. Whereupon Prince John sent him Orders to submit, and, soon after, the Archbishop made his Peace with him. But, upon the Arrival of foreign Troops, sent for by Longchamp, he resolved either to die in Battle, or to drive Prince John out of the Kingdom. At last they were reconciled. Brompton, p. 1223, 1224. Hoved. p. 700.

(11) He was elected by order of King Richard. Brompton, p. 1166.

(12) The Reason of the King's Anger was, that he having filled the Deanry, Treasurership, and some other Dignities in the Church of York, Geoffrey swore that those Promotions should not stand good without his Consent and Approbation; upon which a great Quarrel arose between the King and him. Hoved. p. 639. Besides, Geoffrey refused to be consecrated by Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, and make his free Profession of Canonical Obedience. Brompton, p. 1161. Gervais, p. 1570, &c. Dugdale, p. 633.

(13) Geoffrey, seeing his Brother's Affection could not be obtained without Money, promised him three thousand Pounds, and then he was put in possession of the Temporalties of the Archbishoprick. The King also confirmed to him all the Levy-Free granted him by his father, &c. &c. Hoved. p. 643. Neubrig. p. 1169. Hoved. p. 643.

1171. Normandy till the Expedition to the Holy Land was over (17). After the King was gone, Geoffrey, contrary to his Promise, demanded and obtained the Pope's Bull, to confirm his Election; and without vouchsafing to give the Regent notice, designed to repair into England and take possession of his Dignity. Longchamp being advised of what passed, sent Orders to Dever to apprehend him. Accordingly, upon his Arrival (2) the Bishop had but just time to get into a Church (3), where he thought himself safe from all Insults. But this Precaution not preventing the Execution of the Regent's Orders, Geoffrey was drawn from the Altar (4), and imprisoned in Dever Castle. Prince John took occasion from this Outrage to act openly against Longchamp (5). As he found himself supported by all the Lords, he sent him positive Word to release the Archbishop. Longchamp not being disposed to receive such absolute Orders from a Prince, who had no Right to command him, refused to comply (6). This was directly what John wanted. A few Days after (7), the Regent was summoned to appear before an Assembly of Lords Spiritual and Temporal, convened at London in St. Paul's Church. The Combination was so strong, that Longchamp saw himself on a sudden forsaken by all the World, and constrained to appear before the Assembly (8), which was bent upon his Ruin. He was charged with exceeding his Commission in divers Particulars, chiefly with usurping to himself the Authority, which ought to have been shared between him, the Bishop of Durham, with the six Counsellors. The Archbishop of Reau (9), and Earl of Pembroke complained also, that having received a Patent from the King, dated at Melfina (10), whereby they were made joint Commissioners with Longchamp in the Government, that Prelate would never consent they should have any Concern in the Administration. Some Historians however affirm, these two Lords durst not show their Patent to the Regent (11), for fear he should serve them as he had done the Bishop of Durham. Be this as it will, upon these Accusations Longchamp was turned out of the Regency (12), which was lodged in the Hands of the Archbishop of Reau, till the King's Pleasure should be known (13). They took from him likewise the Custody of the Tower of London and of Windsor Castle (14), which the same Archbishop was invested with. Not content with this Severity, his Enemies compelled him by Threats to lay down his Legate's Cross in the Church of Canterbury, after which, he was thrown into Prison. Some Days after he found means to escape; but was seized again on the Sea-side, disguised in a Woman's Habit, with a Bundle of Linnen under his Arm. In this Garb he was carried to Dever Castle (15), with a great Mob at his Heels (16). However, Prince John dreading the Pope's Repentment, if he detained his Legate in Prison, ordered him to be set at Liberty (17), with permission to retire into Normandy (18). As soon as he found himself safe, he writ to the Pope and the King, setting forth the ill Treatment he had met with. This Letter came very late to the King: But the Pope, who was much sooner informed of the Affront done his Legate, was extremely incensed at this Contempt of the Legantine Character. Without staying to hear what Prince John could allege to justify his Conduct, he sent express Orders to the Bishops to excommunicate him. John, terrified at the Pope's Menaces, would have restored Longchamp, if the Bishops themselves, who dreaded to be again under that imperious Prelate, had not opposed it. Thus the Pope's Orders lay unexecuted, and Longchamp durst not return into England (19).

The deposing of the Regent procuring the Prince an Opportunity of having a greater Share in the Government than the King his Brother desired, he made use of it to pave his way to the Crown. If he had not then Thoughts of taking Advantage of the King's Absence to mount the Throne in his Life-time, it is at least certain his Aim was to secure it, in case the King died during his Expedition (20). He was sensible, there was another Prince that had a better Title than himself, namely, Arthur Duke of Bretagne, his Nephew, Son of his elder Brother Geoffrey. This put him upon taking beforehand such Measures as should free him from the Competition of that Rival. His sole care was to render himself popular, in order to gain the Affection of the English, particularly the Londoners, whose Rights and Privileges he caused to be confirmed by an Assembly-General. This won him the Hearts of the Citizens to such a degree, that when they swore Fealty to the King, they voluntarily made a solemn Promise to receive John for their Sovereign, in case the King died without Issue. In this manner did the Prince gain ground by degrees, and endeavoured by secret Practices, to secure a Party capable of supporting him against his Nephew, and which also he would have afterwards used in much blacker Designs against the King his Brother. Mean time, Richard by his valiant Exploits, which attracted the Admiration of the whole World, was rendering his Name immortal (21), and inspiring the Saracens with a dread of the approaching Downfall of their Empire. But before I relate that Prince's Actions in Palestine, it will be proper briefly to show the then State of the Holy Land, and what had passed there since the Recovery of it by the Christians.

All the Conquests made by the Christians in the East, were erected into a Kingdom, of which Godfrey of Bouillon was the first King. This Kingdom consisted of Palestine and part of Syria, taken from the Saracens. Godfrey reigned about one Year (22). Baldwin his Brother suc-

(1) Till after three Years. Bromp. p. 1171. Gervais. p. 1176.

(2) Before he landed he changed his Cloaths, and the Moment he arrived mounting a swift Horse, got to the Monastery of St. Martin, in Dever, or rather Canterbury, as Ann. Margan. p. 10, have it; and taking Sanctuary in the Church, he was dragged from the Altar in his Episcopal Vestments through the dirty Streets, and delivered to Matthieu de Clerc, Countess of Dever-Castle, who had married Longchamp's Sister. Hoved. p. 701. Bromp. p. 1122. Gervais. p. 1176.

(3) After he had been four Days there. Gervais. ibid.

(4) Bromp. says, Longchamp had sent his two Brothers to the King of Scots, to concert Measures with him to place the Crown on Prince Arthur's Head, in case King Richard died in his Expedition. This Prince John had been informed of, p. 1194.

(5) Prince John gathered numerous Forces together, not only out of the Counties belonging to him, but also out of Wales; and was joined by several Earl and Barons, as also by the Bishops of Windsor, Exeter, and Chichester of Exeter: And thus sent Longchamp word, That if he did not let the Archbishop at Liberty, he would come and rescue him by force. So the Chancellor, frightened at the Prince's Threats, released the Archbishop, who immediately and complained to Prince John of the Indignity that had been offered him: For which Longchamp refusing to make Satisfaction, the Archbishop of Reau and six Bishops, denounced the Sentence of Excommunication against him; and summoned him to appear before Prince John, and them at Rotting, on a Sunday, but he took no notice of the Summons, though he was no farther than Windsor. Hearing that Prince John was advancing towards London, he hastened thither, and shut himself in the Tower. Bromp. p. 1225, 1226. Gervais. p. 1177. Dieto. p. 663, 664. Hoved. p. 701.

(6) He did not appear before them, but kept himself shut in the Tower of London. Bromp. p. 1226. Prince John, with the Earls and Barons, and the Citizens of London, besieged him in the Tower. After he had held out one Night, he desired leave to go out of the Kingdom: Which was granted him, but, upon condition he should resign the Castles he was possessed of to some certain Persons; accordingly he gave Sunder for the Performance of it. From thence he went to Canterbury, and afterwards to Dever, where he spent some time with Matthieu de Clerc, his Brother-in-law, Countess of the Castle; and here, attempting to go out of the Kingdom after he had given caution, and after the Lords Justice had given the Inhabitants of Dever Orders not to let him go out of the Realm, he was served in the manner related by Rapin. Bromp. p. 1226, 1227. Gervais. p. 1177, 1178. Hoved. p. 701.

(7) Canterbury is here put by mistake in the French for Reau; for it was the Archbishop of Reau and not of Canterbury that was joined in Communion with William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, and Geoffrey Fitz Peter; Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, went with the King, and died during the Siege of Acre.

(8) Which the King granted them, when he heard of Longchamp's Misdeemeanors. Bromp. p. 1194. See the Patent in Dieto. p. 659.

(10) By a Parliament. See Bromp. ibid. Dieto. p. 664.

(11) Dieto. says, that the King ordered in his Letters-Patents, that in case Longchamp did not faithfully manage the Affairs of the Kingdom according to the Advice of his Counsellors, they might act without him; particularly he enjoined that nothing should be transacted without the Archbishop of Reau, whom, as he said, he had sent over for the better Defence of the Kingdom; which if true, vindicates the Proceedings of that Assembly. Dieto. p. 659.

(12) And of the Castles of Canterbury, Dever, and Hereford. Dieto. p. 665.

(13) As he was, sitting on a Rock, waiting for a Boat with an Ell in his Hand, and a Parcel of Linnen, as if he had been a Pedlar; a Seaman came by, and taking him for a Woman, went to kiss him; and then offering at farther Indecencies, discovered him to be a Man, but however marched off without doing any thing. A little after some Women coming by began to chide him, but being a Frenchman, and understanding little English, he could make them no answer. Finding he would not speak, they pulled up the Hood which was over his Face, and then presently saw his black Beard; upon which crying out, the People came running by, and used him in the manner above. Hoved. p. 400.

(14) After eight Days Imprisonment. Bromp. p. 1228. Then a Parliament was called, which approved of, and confirmed the Archbishop of Reau, Sec. as Justiciary of the Realm. ibid.

(15) He went to London, thence to Paris, and afterwards to Normandy. Ofeb. 29. Bromp. ibid. Dieto. p. 665.

(16) While he had the Custody of the Tower of London, he built a Wall, and made the Ditch that is round it. Bromp. p. 1171. Hoved. p. 665. M. Willel. p. 258.

(17) The Citizens of London were so ready to him, in case his Brother died in his Expedition. Hoved. p. 702.

(18) Before he left London, in October, he made a Law concerning Shipwrecks, namely, That every Person which suffered Shipwreck, and got safe on shore, should deliver it to the King; but if he was on Ship-board, his Children, or other nearest Relations, were to have the Goods, according as they could make out their wrong next to King's but, if they had no Heirs nor near Relations, then the King was to have their Goods. Bromp. p. 1187. Hoved. p. 678.

(19) He was crowned with a Crown of Thorns in the Year 1099.

1192. Masters of Jerusalem. However as he could not constrain him to stay, he left him to do as he pleased, upon his taking a solemn Oath, in the presence of the Bishops and principal Officers of both Armies, not to attack any Place belonging to Richard, either in France or in England, till forty Days after the Return of that Prince into his own Territories. Upon quitting Palestine (1), Philip left ten thousand Men under the Command of the Duke of Burgundy, publicly ordering him to pay the same Obedience to the King of England as to himself (2). But in all Appearance, he gave him other Instructions in private. This Mexrai does as good as own, when he says, Richard would have become Master of Jerusalem, if the Duke of Burgundy's Jealousy had not obstructed it.

A little after the King of France's Departure, Richard and Saladine exhibited a Spectacle of Horror to their Armies, by commanding the Prisoners each had in his Power, to be put to Death (3). It is difficult to determine which of the two Princes was the first Author of this Barbarity. Some Historians lay the blame on Saladine, others accuse the King of England. These last seem to me to have most reason. The Saracen Monarch refused to perform the Articles of the Surrender of Acre (4), whereas no other reason is alleged that could induce the Infidel to this Cruelty but his natural Fierceness, though he appears upon other occasions to have been a very generous Prince. This much is certain the Duke of Burgundy, following Richard's Example, ordered all what Captives were in his hands, to be beheaded. I do not pretend to determine what may be the Law of Arms, with respect to Prisoners whose Sovereign refuses to perform a Capitulation, or how far Retributions may extend. But methinks, one can hardly be mistaken in saying, that whoever goes to the Extent of his Power, on such occasions, is in danger of committing a very great Injustice. Be this as it will, Instances of the like Barbarity are very rare in History.

After the departure of the French, Richard held a great Council of War, where the Siege of Ajalon was resolved (5). To execute this Project, he marched along the Sea-Side, whilst his Fleet, freighted with all manner of Stores, rowed in Sight of the Troops, and supplied them with Necessaries. Saladine having Intelligence of the Croisades Designs, posted himself advantageously in their way, with an Army of three hundred thousand Men. Whatever Disproportion there might be between their Forces, Richard resolved to attack him thus posted. He was sensible, could he defeat that Army, not only the taking of Ajalon would be the Fruits of his Victory, but even the Siege of Jerusalem would become much less difficult; on the contrary, if he declined the Fight, such a numerous Army of Infidels would continually obstruct the Execution of his Designs. Pursuant to this Resolution, he approached the Enemy, and drawing up his Army, undauntedly marched against them. James d'Avesnes commanded the Right Wing, the Duke of Burgundy the Left, and the King headed the main Body. Saladine had concealed part of his Army, on his right Side, behind some Hills which prevented the Christians from seeing them. As he expected great Matters from this Ambuscade, he resolved not to lose the Advantage of the Ground. Accordingly, without stirring from his Post, he waited for the Enemy to attack him.

The Right Wing of the Christians beginning the Fight, the Saracens answered James d'Avesnes with a Resolution, which, supported by the Superiority of their Number, put that Body in such a Disorder that it could not be repaired for a considerable while. James d'Avesnes was slain in striving to revive the Courage of his frightened Troops and bring them again to charge. At the same time, the Duke of Burgundy furiously attacked the Right Wing of the Saracens, which, pursuant to the General's Orders, retreating as they fought, caused the Duke to advance, with more Courage than Conduct, a good way beyond the Body of the Army. Saladine, finding all in good order on his Left, and that the Duke of Burgundy with his Left Wing was detached from the rest of the Army, ordered the Body that lay concealed to move forward. These Troops descending down the Hills in great Multitudes, surrounded the Wing commanded by the Duke of Burgundy, and made a terrible Slaughter.

It lay then upon Richard to save the Honour of the Christians, and repair their Loss. He had fought on his Side with better Success, and, though he had met with a stout Resistance in the Body that opposed him, had compelled them to retreat in disorder. He was still pursuing his Enemies, when he was informed of the ill State of his Right Wing, and the danger of his Left. Upon which he gave over the Pursuit, and marching to the Duke of Burgundy's Relief, fell upon the victorious Troops of Saladine, in order to wrest from them a Victory of which they thought themselves sure. On this famous occasion he was seen to perform such astonishing Acts of Valour, that those who envied him most, could not but admire him. Some tell us, he was personally engaged with Saladine, and dismounting him would have taken him Prisoner, had not the Saracens used their utmost Efforts to rescue him out of his Hands. Be this as it will, this much is certain, that Richard's Valour so altered the State of the Battle, that Saladine saw himself obliged to reinforce his Right Wing, with part of the victorious Troops of the Left. This Motion, which could not be done without causing some disorder, gave the Right Wing of the Christians time to come to themselves. Finding they were not so victoriously pressed as before, they quickly rallied, and falling furiously on the Saracen Troops that opposed them, forced them at length to take to Flight.

Mean while, Richard maintained the Fight on the Left, with a Firmness that seemed more than Natural, in spite of the Superiority of his Enemies, who had drawn all their Forces against him. He was however in danger of being over-powered by Numbers, had not his Right Wing, which met with no further Resistance, come to his Aid. Then the Saracens, finding they were attacked in Flank by the fresh Troops, began to break their Ranks with such Confusion, that it was not possible for Saladine to rally them. The Christians taking Advantage of their disorder, pressed them so vigorously, that they entirely routed at length that prodigious Army. Thus Richard, by his Valour and Conduct, obtained a complete Victory over the Enemies of the Christian Name, of whom forty thousand lay dead in the Field of Battle. James d'Avesnes was the only Officer of Distinction that was slain on the Side of the Christians.

After this important Victory, Richard continued his march to the maritime Cities of Ajalon, Joppa, and Cesarea, which Saladine thought fit to abandon, after demolishing their Walls. It was of the utmost Consequence to the Christians to repair these Cities, and erect Magazines for the Army, when they should be farther advanced into the Enemy's Country. This probably, was the sole Reason which obliged the victorious Prince to stay some time at Joppa. Some however have taxed him with not improving his Victory, by marching directly to Jerusalem. But I can't tell whether he is to be blamed upon their Authority. There are so few capable of judging rightly of these Matters, especially when the Circumstances are but imperfectly known, that I do not think it Prudence to pass one's Verdict thereon.

During Richard's stay at Joppa, an Adventure befel him, which had like to prove very fatal to him, and from which he was delivered by a sort of Miracle. One day, being tired with Hunting, as he lay asleep under a Tree, with only six Persons about him, he was roused by the sudden Approach of some Saracen Horse, who were near the Place where he slept. As they were but few in Number, he had no manner of dread upon him, but immediately mounting his Horse, rode after them; which they perceiving, feigned to fly before him, and by that means drew him into an Ambuscade, where he saw himself surrounded on a sudden by a Squadron of Horse. He defended himself a long time with a wonderful Bravery, without any Thoughts of retreating, notwithstanding the Number of his Enemies. At length, Four of his Attendants being killed, he was upon the point of being slain or taken, when William Despreaux (6), one of his Company, cried out in the Saracen Language; I am the King of England. At which Words, those that were upon Richard, left him to have a hand in the taking of Despreaux, whom they imagined to be the King. This Device gave Richard time to ride off full speed, whilst the Saracens content with their 1192. Success, conducted their Prisoner to Saladine. Despreaux had the Prudence not to discover himself till he came before the Sultan, to whom he ingeniously confessed what he had done to save his Master. Saladine commended his Fidelity, and did him a great deal of Honour. But as he was very sensible, Richard would never suffer one that had done him so signal a Service to remain long a Captive, he let his ransom go high, that he procured ten Emirs or Saracen Princes, in Exchange for that faithful Servant.

As soon as the maritime Places were sufficiently repaired, Richard marched to Jerusalem, which he had resolved to besiege. In his way he had the good Fortune to meet the Babylon Caravan, carrying to Jerusalem a prodigious Quantity of rich Merchandizes and Provisions of all kinds. The Caravan was guarded by ten thousand (1) Horse, who finding themselves near the Christian Army, would immediately have retreated. But Richard taking with him five thousand chosen Horsemen, fell upon them with great Fury, and putting them to Flight, became Master of the Caravan. He took on this Occasion three thousand loaded Camels, and four thousand Horses or Mules, with an inestimable Booty, which he ordered to be distributed all among his Soldiers. After this happy Success, continuing his March to Jerusalem, he came to a Hill, from whence he had the Pleasure to survey that famous City, the taking of which was the chief End of his Expedition. Mean time, as the Country round was destitute of Forage, he saw himself under the fatal Necessity of deferring the Siege till the Spring. This delay furnished his Enemies and those that envied him, with a Pretence to desert him. The Duke of Austria led the way, and the Duke of Burgundy quickly followed him, not being able to bear the Thoughts of contributing any longer to the Glory of a Prince whom he considered as the King of France's Rival (2). His Death, which happened at Acre as he was going to embark, prevented not the French Troops from sailing to Europe. The retreat of the Germans and French; the Marquess of Monferrat's refusal to assist with the Italian Troops in a Conquest, to which he laid claim, but was designed for another; the News Richard received of what passed in England; his Apprehensions that Philip would take Advantage of his Absence and declare War against him (3); the decrease of his Troops, as well by Sickness as Battles; all these Reasons were but too capable to make him think of retreating, and were sufficient to justify his Truce with Saladine, without regarding the vain Declarations of those who confidently blamed him for deserting the Cause, when within View of Jerusalem (4). It is easy to see, that with the few Troops that remained, it was not possible for him to accomplish an Enterprize of so difficult a Nature as was then the Siege of that City. During the whole Winter he had found time to lay in all manner of Stores, and the Garrison was little inferior to the Christian Army. Saladine having notice of Richard's Design to retire, thought it his Interest to hasten the Departure of so formidable an Enemy, by offering him a three years Truce. All the principal Officers of the Christian Army, joyfully embraced this Offer. Every one was glad, after so many Hardships, to go and enjoy some Repose in his own Country. Richard therefore accepted of the Truce which was proposed upon these Conditions: That the City of Acre should be dismantled, not fortified again by either Party during the Truce: That Joppa or Jaffa, and Acre or Ptolemais, should remain in the Hands of the Christians, with the rest of the Cities they were possessed of in Palestine: That the Christians should have Liberty to go in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem without charge, and free Commerce throughout all Saladine's Dominions. The Treaty being concluded, Richard sent Saladine word, that he might depend upon seeing him again, to try once more to recover the Holy Land out of his Hands. The Sultan, with a Politeness that favoured not the Barbarian, replied, That, if it must be his Fate to lose that Part of his Dominions, he had rather it should be to the King of England, than to any other Monarch in the World. Thus ended the famous Crusade, which had drained France and England both of Men and Money. It proved of very little Benefit to the Eastern Christians, whilst it ruined those of Europe, by the prodigious Sums therein expended. But that was not all; it became the Occasion of destructive Wars between France and England, as we shall see presently.

Richard, fearing that in his Absence, Saladine would break the Truce, assembled the principal Officers of the Army, in order to elect a General capable of commanding the Troops designed to be left in Palestine. The choice fell upon the Marquiss of Monferrat, to Richard's great Surprise, who had openly declared against him. However he gave his consent, and sacrificed his private Repentment to the publick Good of the Christians. Shortly after the Marquiss was stabbed by two Villains, sent for that Purpose by the Old Man of the Mountain: For that was the Appellation given to the Head or chief Master of a sort of People inhabiting about Antioch, called Chaffins, or some such Name. The Old Man of the Mountain always kept in his Service a Set of People devoted to his Will, whom he dispatched into all Parts of the World upon the like Occasions. Hence the French called him the Prince of the Assassins, or perhaps the word Assassin is derived from the Name of these People (5). As the Author of this Murder was at first unknown, Richard, because he was no Friend to the Marquiss, was by some suspected. But the Marquiss himself was so far from such a Thought, that just as he died, he ordered his Wife to deliver into the Hands of the King of England the City of Tyre, of which he was in possession. After the Death of the Marquiss of Monferrat, Richard so ordered it that Henry Earl of Champagne, his, as well as the King of France's Nephew, was chosen in his place. After which, he caused him to marry Isabella, the deceased's Widow, who brought him for her Dowry the Titular Kingdom of Jerusalem. As for Guy of Lusignan, the King made up his loss of an empty Title with the real Donation of the Kingdom of Cyprus, though he had sold it before to the Templars. Upon the repeated Complaints of the Cypriots, to whom the Tyranny of their new Masters was become insupportable, Richard thought he had a Right to revoke the Sale. Whether this was consistent with Justice, is needless now to inquire. It is sufficient to observe, Guy was put in possession of his Kingdom, which remained near two Centuries in his Family.

The Affairs of the East being thus settled (6), Richard, impatient to return to England, embarked at Ptolemais, from whence he sailed to Corfu, an Island situated at the Entrance of the Adriatick Gulph. Probably, his design was to land somewhere in the bottom of the Gulph, and continue his Journey to Land through Germany. However some say, he was driven against his Will by stress of Weather into those Parts. Whatever his Design might be, he was exposed to a violent Storm, which forced him on the Coast of Ibria, and from thence between Aquila and Venice, where the Galliot, he was on Board, split upon a Rock. It was with great Difficulty that he escaped this Danger, to run immediately into another. Whether he was ignorant of the Country, or for some other unknown Reason, he entered the Territories of the Duke of Austria, and took the Road to Vinna. If this was not done through Ignorance, it will be difficult to dive into his design. Besides that this was by no means his way to England, it was great Imprudence to hazard his Person in the Dominions of a Prince, whom he had so mortally offended at the Siege of Acre. However this be, he continued his Journey disguised like a Pilgrim, well knowing he had every thing to fear from the Duke's Repentment, should he chance to be discovered. His lavish Expences, and the Indiscretion of some of his Attendants, were the Occasion of a Rumour's being quickly spread that the King of England was in those Parts. The Duke of Austria having Notice of it, caused the pretended Pilgrim to be watched so narrowly, that he was seized (7) at a small Village (8) near Vinna (9). The News reaching the Emperor Henry VI, he sent and demanded the Prisoner of the Duke of Austria, who delivered him, upon Assurance of having a large Share of his Ransom.

Thus Richard, whose Fame filled the whole Earth, and whose noble Actions had exalted him above all the Princes of his time, lost his Liberty, and saw himself in the Power of the most fickle and ungenerous of Princes.

The News of Richard's Imprisonment quickly flew over Europe, and particularly into England, where it caused a great Consternation. Queen Eleanor, his Mother, immediately took all possible care to prevent this Accident from occasioning some fatal Revolution. She represented to the principal Barons, that they could not give the King more effectual Proofs of their Fidelity, than by opposing, to the utmost of their Power, the Attempts of Prince John, whose ill designs were no secret. That it was necessary to begin with this, in order to preserve the Peace of the Realm; and that afterwards other Affairs might be taken care of. The Queen's Exhortations, the King's unfortunate Condition, and the Fame he had acquired in the East, concurred to keep the English Barons in the Fidelity due to their Sovereign. As they did not question but John would improve this Juncture to disturb the State, they entered into an Association to exclude him from the Government, at the very time he was taking measures to seize it. The Opportunity appearing to him very favorable, he had formed a design to take the Administration of Affairs into his Hands, that he might more easily wrest the Crown from the King's Brother. But he was prevented by the Diligence of the Queen's Mother, and the Barons. He had the Mortification to see other Regents appointed during the King's Imprisonment.

However, he forbore not to use his endeavours to break an Association so prejudicial to him. He affirmed, his sole Aim was to secure himself against the Pretensions of his Nephew, the Duke of Bretagne, in case Richard should die in Prison. But all his Proceedings plainly showed, his design was rather to obstruct the King's return, supposing he should be so fortunate as to obtain his Liberty. And indeed he neglected nothing to become master of the fortified Towns, or gain the Governours to his Interests. It is no wonder, that at such a juncture, he prevailed with some, but in general he met with so great opposition to his designs, that he found at length there was no possibility of succeeding without the King of France's Assistance. As soon as he was determined, he departed (1) in order to confer with Philip. As he went through Normandy, he staid some Days at Rouen, where he tried all ways to corrupt the Loyalty of the Normans; but not succeeding, repaired to Paris, where he made a Treaty with Philip, who desired nothing more than to embroil Richard's Affairs.

If certain Historians may be credited, John obliged himself to marry the Princess Alice, refused by Richard, and do Homage to the Crown of France for the Kingdom of England. I do not know whether these Authors had sufficient Authority to assert these two Particulars. It is certain the Treaty it self, which is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, says nothing like it; neither is it probable that John, who was already married, should promise to espouse another Wife. It seems more likely therefore, that Philip, as the Treaty imports, was satisfied with admitting John to do Homage for all the Provinces in France belonging to the Crown of England (2), which, as Sovereign Lord, he pretended to dispose of.

As soon as John had finished his Affairs in France, he embarked for England, with design to use his utmost endeavours to gain the King of Scotland: But William remembering Richard's generous Usage, would give no ear to his Solicitations, whatever means John employed to make him believe the imprisoned King would never recover his Liberty. All his endeavours, as well with regard to the Normans as the King of Scotland, proving ineffectual, he sought himself of another Expedient. He caused it to be rumoured that Richard was dead in Prison, and upon that Foundation, demanded the Crown. But as there was no other Advice of the King's Death, he did not find the English inclined to take this rash step in his favour, without further Confirmation. Mean time, they refused furnished him with a Pretence to seize some Places of Strength (3), as being willing to take by Force what he could not obtain by fair Means. But his Party was so inconsiderable, that it was not possible for him to make any great Progress.

Whilst these things passed in England, Philip was not idle in France. In a Relief, that the English employed at Home with John's Pretensions, would not be able to send any Succours beyond Sea, he resolved to seize the Provinces held by Richard in France. Pursuant to this Project, forgetting the Oath taken upon quitting Palestine, he made himself Master of Gisors, Evreux, and Alençon, after which he laid Siege to Rouen. He hoped to surprise that City, the taking of which would have given after it all the rest of Normandy, but had the Mortification to miss his Aim. The Earl of Leicester, who had thrown himself into the City some Days before, made so brave a Defence, that after an Assault, wherein the French were repulsed with great Loss, Philip was forced to raise the Siege.

Mean time, Queen Eleanor not content with opposing a strong Fence against the Ambition of her younger Son, laboured with all her Power the King's Release. As the Emperor had no plausible Colour to detain him in Prison, she imagined, a powerful Mediation, such as the Pope's, might have a good Effect. In this Belief she frequently wrote to his Holiness, entreating him to take in hand the King her Son's Cause. All her Solicitations not prevailing, she sent him at length a very exultatory Letter, plainly showing how highly she was provoked at his Insufficiency. She complained, that he would not take the least Step in behalf of the imprisoned King. That he refused to send a Venue to the Emperor, though he often sent Legates to all the Christian States, on much less important Occasions: That this Behaviour was so much the more strange, as it would be to Disregardment to his Dignity, should he go in Person and solicit the Release of a great King, who had lately expiated his Life in the Service of the Church. In short, she represented to him, That the many good Offices in which the Holy See stood indebted to the Kings of England, well deserved some return; and that the Services done the Pope during the Schisms, could not be forgotten without Ingratitude. But all these Instances were to no Purpose. The Pope did not think fit to concern himself about an unfortunate Prince, for fear of displeasing the King of France, by whom he was pressed, on the other hand, not to interpose in the Affair.

Whilst the Queen laboured in vain to move the Pope, Richard, who wanted a Check for his Injuries, ordered Richard to be conducted to Lagny-sur-Marne, where the Diet of the Empire was assembled. The Deputies sent by the Queen and Council to the King to acquaint him with what passed in England, met on the Road their unfortunate Prince ignominiously conducted like a Criminal. This melancholy sight drew Tears from their Eyes, at which the King could not forbear weeping. After they had, by many affectionate Expressions, shown their concern for his Misfortune, and assured him of the Loyalty of his Subjects in general, they informed him of his Brother's Attempts, and his strict Union with the King of France. These Informations made him sensible, that in the present posture of his Affairs, it was very improper to dispute with the Emperor, upon the Terms of his Freedom. In this Resolution, he was brought before the Assembly of the German Princes, where the Emperor charged him with six Articles, of which but one could concern himself, and none the German Nation in particular. I. He accused Richard of joining in a League with Vancered to support that Usurper in the possession of the Kingdom of Sicily. II. He alleged, that by his Contests with the King of France he had obstructed the Congress of Jerusalem. III. He charged him with unjustly invading the Kingdom of Cyprus, and employing the Arms of the Croisades to dethrone a Christian Prince. IV. He taxed him with affronting the Duke of Austria, at the Siege of Ptolemais. V. He accused him of being concerned in the Murder of the Marquis of Montfort. VI. And lastly, he laid to his Charge, as a great Crime, the Truce concluded with Saladin, and accused him of holding Intelligence with that Infidel Prince, to the great Detriment of Christendom in general.

Though neither the Emperor nor the Princes of Germany had any Right to sit as Judges upon the King of England, Richard did not think proper to dispute their Authority. He was too apprehensive of giving occasion for Delays, which must have been very prejudicial to him. In all appearance, that was the Emperor's sole Aim. He was contented therefore with briefly saying, That he looked upon himself as accountable to none for his Actions, he was willing however to vindicate himself before that illustrious Assembly; not that he considered them as his Judges, but because it greatly concerned his Honour, that the World should think him Innocent. Then he made his Defence against the Em-

Whilst the English were employed in raising the King's ransom, Philip and John tried all ways to break his Agreement with the Emperor. As soon as Philip heard of it, he sent John word, to let to himself, since he had so much like to get lost. This News threw the Prince into great Contemneration. He saw all his hopes vanish, and himself upon the point of falling into the Hands of a justly incensed Brother, without knowing how to divert the terrible Blow. In this Perplexity, he had no other Remedy, to unite still more strictly with Philip, and endeavour, with his help, to break Richard's Measures. As these two Princes had some common Interest, they agreed to act together to engage the Emperor by advantageous Offers, to detain Richard in Prison. The Bishop of Beauvais was again commissioned to make Henry the following Proposals. That provided, he would promise to detain Richard till Michaelmas, Philip would pay him down fifty thousand, and John thirty thousand, Marks. That after that Term, they would return him monthly one thousand Pound Sterling, as long as Richard was kept Prisoner: That in case he would deliver him into their Hands, they would pay the whole Ransom of a hundred and fifty thousand Marks. In fine, if he refused this offer, the Ambassador was ordered to tender him the same Sum, to keep him Prisoner one Year. These offers had such an effect on the covetous Emperor, that he deferred the King's Deliverance till the next Diet, which was to meet at Spire in a few Months, though Eleanor was come to Worms with a hundred thousand Marks, and Hoists for the payment of the rest. It is easy to guess Richard's Contemneration, when he heard this unwelcome News. He was not ignorant of his Brother's Endeavours to seize his Crown, and was satisfied, Philip would employ all his Forces to support him in his unjust Designs. On the other hand, he too well knew the Emperor's Temper, to hope to soften a Heart that was a stranger to all generous Sentiments. In this melancholy State, the Diet was entirely ruined, the time he passed till the Diet, was very heavy and most grievous of his Life. He was very justly alarmed, for the Emperor had actually determined to comply with the King of France, and sacrifice his Honour to sordid Interest. The Diet being adjourned at Spire in February (5), the Emperor added himself to the German Princes in Terms plainly importing, he made no Account of his Agreement with the King of England. Surprised at this Proceeding, they could not forbear telling him their Thoughts. They strongly represented to him, that being themselves Pledges of the Treaty, they could not in Honour see it violated, and even intimated he should not break it with Impunity. Whether Henry was in fear of their Threats, or Shame made some Impression on his Mind, he was prevailed with to let his Prisoner free, upon receiving the hundred thousand Marks, and Hostages for the fifty thousand that were unpaid. Richard was no sooner at Liberty, but he speedily left Germany, and repaired to the Less-Comines, flying by the way no longer than was absolutely necessary. This speed was requisite, for Henry repenting of his release, late after him to seize him, but it was too late. As soon as he came to Antwerp, he embarked for England, and safely arrived at Sandwich on the 20th of March 1194, after a short Voyage of some Months whereof he had passed in Prison.

1194. Before I finish what relates to Richard's Imprisonment, let me to return hereafter to the Payment of the Refidue of his Ranfom, I shall add here what passed on that head, both with respect to the Emperor and the Duke of Austria. The last, after frequently solliciting Richard, to satisfy him, sent Baldwin of Betune, one of the Hostages, to let him know, that he would come upon those he had in his Power, if the Treaty of Hagenau was not speedily executed. Richard, who knew by Experience the cruel Temper of that Prince, forthwith sent back the same Baldwin with the Princess Eleanor, that the stipulated Marriage might be consummated, till the rest of the Ranfom was paid. In all appearance, the Emperor had taken for himself the hundred thousand Marks, and turned over the debt to the Duke of Austria. Be this as it will, Eleanor and Baldwin found, upon their Arrival at Vienna, that the Duke was dead of a Fall from his Horse. Before he reigned his last Breath, he made his Will, wherein he ordered the King of England's Hostages to be released continently, he had unjustly detained him, and could not in Conscience demand a Ranfom. Notwithstanding this exprefs Order, the Prince his Son, who succeeded him, would have detained the Hostages, had not the Bishops opposed it. They declared, they would not permit his Father's Corpse to be buried till his last Will was performed. The Pope likewise sent him a Letter, telling him, he had ordered the Archbishop of Salzburg to excommunicate him, if he deferred any longer the Execution of his Father's Will. Prevailed upon by these Menaces, he released the Hostages, and finding he had no great Inclination for the Princess of Bretagne, sent her back also to England. As for the Emperor, his Difference with the Pope, and the War he was meditating against France, making him sensible he might have occasion for the King of England, he wished to be reconciled to him. To that purpose, he sent a Bishop to beg his pardon, and assure him that he intended to restore what had been extorted from him. But he died shortly after at Messina, before he performed his Promise.

Richard was received by his Subjects with Demonstrations of Joy and Affection, which made him forget all the Disgraces he had suffered during his Captivity (1). His first care was to discharge his Vow, to offer to God the rich Standard of Cyprus in St. Edmund's Church. Which done, he marched to reduce some Castles still in the hands of John's Adherents, of which Nottingham Castle was the only one that held out a Siege of some days. Mean time, he ordered the Prince his Brother, who was retired to France, to be summoned to appear within forty days, and answer the Accusations exhibited against him. John not appearing within the Time limited, the King caused a sentence to be passed against him, confiscating all his Lands, and declaring him incapable of succeeding to the Crown.

The Affair being ended, Richard was crowned again, for fear his Imprisonment might have raised any Scruples in the Minds of his Subjects. William King of Scotland assisted at the Solemnity, and carried the Sword of State before the King (2). This Defence, and his constant Attachment to Richard whistled a Captive, entirely gained him the Affection of that Prince, who gave him all possible Marks of his Friendship. Indeed, he did not think fit to resign him Northumberland, the Possession whereof he very earnestly demanded, upon a dubious Title that was even renounced by his Predecessor. However, to fatten in some Measure this Refusal, he granted him a Charter of certain Honours and Privileges to be enjoyed by the Kings of Scotland whenever they came into England (3).

1195. Richard was too much bent upon being revenged of the King of France, to deny himself any longer that Satisfaction. The Forgivenes of Injuries is a Virtue too rare among Men, to be met with in a Prince who was none of the most scrupulous in point of Religion. To execute this Design, he flood in need of a powerful Army, which could be neither raised nor maintained without an extraordinary Charge. His Kingdom, already drained, was but little able to furnish him with the necessary Supplies. However, Money must be had at any Rate, and for that purpose divers not very honorable Ways and Means were used. In the first place, he revoked all the Alienations of 1195-9. Land, Richard had committed her to the Custody of the Bishop of Normandy, who had refused to deliver her without his Master's express Order, though Philip had often demanded her.

At the same time Joanna (1). Sister to Richard, and Widow of the King of Sicily, married the Earl of Thouloze. She obtained of the King her Brother an entire Renunciation of all Right and Title, as Heir of the House of Plantagenet, to the Earldom of Thouloze.

In the Month of June, during the War, that Philip de Dreux, Bishop of Bath, a near Relation of the King of France, being in a Battle, was taken Prisoner by the English. His Quality, Character, but chiefly, some injurious Expressions in speaking of Richard, occasioned his Ransom to be set at so high a rate, that he applied to the Pope for his Protection. His Holiness strongly interceded for his daily beloved Son, as he called him, in a Letter to the King in his Bed. Richard in Answer sent the Bishop's Armour, all bloody as it was, and asked him, whether he knew his Son's Coat? This clear Evidence of the weak Temper of the English, caused the Pope to desert from his Solicitations, and to say, since he had quitted the Warfare of Christ for that of the World, it was but just, he should suffer the Consequences of so ill a Choice. Upon this Answer, the Bishop despairing of Alliance from Rome, compounded for his Ransom, which was set at two thousand Marks (2).

In the Account History give of this War, the French talk of nothing but the Advantages gained by Philip, and slightly pass over his Losses. The English, on the contrary, telling little notice of several Engagements, where the French victors Richard was worsted, carefully extol his great Success. Among other Advantages, they magnify a Victory obtained over his Enemy between Coarrelle and Cygn, which the French slightly mention, as an Event of little Importance. They say, Philip advancing with five hundred Horse to view the Enemy, was like to be surrounded, and forced to retreat to Gisors with some Precipitation. They add, the Bridge of that City falling down under him, he was in danger of losing his Life by that Accident. It is certain, however, Richard sent to England a Letter concerning that Action, now to be seen in the Collection of the Publick Acts, wherein he boasts of gaining that Day a glorious Victory. That Prince, very probably, would not have expressed himself thus, had he only routed five hundred Horse. Some English Historians even affirm, that on occasion of this Victory, Richard added to the Arms of England the Motto, Dieu & mon Droit. But I can hardly believe this Motto to be so ancient, or to owe its Original to that Event.

The Forces of the two Kings were too much upon an Equality for either to hope to make any great Progress in the War. After having sufficiently tried one another, finding that all their Advantages amounted only to the taking some paltry Towns, which very often were retaken immediately, they gladly embraced an opportunity which offered to put an honorable end to the War: And that was by yielding to the Pope's Exhortations, who sent his Legate into France to try to induce them to a Peace. The Pope's aim was to engage them in a fresh Crusade for the recovery of Jerusalem. But they were both too much discouraged by the first, to have any thoughts of a second Expedition. The Legate's Arrival however had a good Effect, as it procured between the two Monarchs a Truce for five Years, which put some stop to the Calamities, their Subjects groaned under. This Truce was concluded at a Conference, where it was agreed each should remain in possession of what was in his Hand.

At this Conference, Philip leagu'd to espouse the Interests of Richard, shew'd him some Papers, whereby his Brother Prince John appeared to have all designs against him. Richard too hastily giving Credit to him, espoused his Brother once more of all he had been restored to. But John openly vindicated himself, in sending to the Court of France two Knights who offered to maintain by Arms, that the Prince was falsely accused. Philip not then thinking fit to accept of the Challenge, Richard perceived his Brother's Innocence, and recalled him to his Effects.

Whilst Richard was employed in France, the City of London was all on a sudden in great Danger, by reason of a Sedition raised by one William Fitz-Osborn, commonly called William Long-Beard, from the great Length of his Beard. This daring and seditious Man, by addressing himself continually to be an Advocate for the Poor and Meanness of the People, had gained the Hearts of the Populace, who held him in extreme Veneration. He made use of the Advantage to stir up a Sedition in the City, on account of a Tax, the Burden of which, according to him, would wholly fall on the Poor. Robert Arden, Bishop of Canterbury, who was then the Justiciary, could not appease the Tumult without calling the principal Citizens to take to their Arms. Long-Beard finding this had proved, fled to the Church of St. Mary le Bow, where he was seized, and afterwards hanged in Chains with nine of his Accomplishers (3).

Richard's late Truce with France, gave him Opportunity of going to England, and enjoying some Repose, after all his Fatigues since his first Accession to the Crown. His Presence was moreover necessary in England, to reform divers Abuses crept in during his Absence. Accordingly this was what he resolv'd to do, but an unexpected Accident obstructed his Design. A Lincoln Gentleman finding in his Estate a Treasure which had been hid there for many Ages, the King pretended, as it was found in a Country of which he had the Sovereignty (4), it belonged to him. The Gentleman was willing to compound the Matter by giving him part, but finding he would have the Whole, applied to Richard in Vicount of Lincoln for Protection, who shew'd him in his Castle of Chahuz. Richard, who was not used to meet with Opposition from his Inferiors, march'd directly into Lincoln, to lay Siege to the Castle where the Gentleman had taken Refuge. When he came nigh the Place, he went round it, in order to view it. But approaching too near, one Bertram [Gardener] an Archer, who was upon the Walls shot him with an Arrow in the Shoulder, close to his Neck (5). The Wound in it self was not mortal, but made so by the Unskilfulness of the Surgeon that dress'd it. It is said, the King himself by his Intemperance did not a little help to inflame it. Be this as it will, the Wound gangrened, and he died of it the eleventh Day (6), after enduring a great deal of Misery. The Castle being taken whilst he was yet alive (7), and the Person that wounded him brought into his Presence, he asked him the Reason why he fought his Life. Bertram replied with an astonishing Boldness, it was in Revenge of his Father and Brother, slain by the King's own hand; and added, he gave God Thanks for having so well succeeded, and was ready to undergo with pleasure the most grievous Torments, since he was so fortunate as to free the World from such a Tyrant. Though such an Answer was very like to exasperate the King against him, the dying Prince forgave him, and order'd him to be set at Liberty, with a present of a hundred Shillings. But immediately after the King's Death, Marchad General of the Flaming, caus'd the miserable Wretch to be staid alive.

It does not appear that Boregilla, Richard's Queen, came into England. Hoved. p. 753.

(3) John being taken away and buried, his Flowers pretend'd that Miracles were wrought at his Grave; but Cards being set at the Place, and some other things to pray, loudly beaten for their Faith, the Cheat was soon through, and Philip set all off their Devotion to one period.

1199. Before he died, Richard made his Will, leaving his Kingdom with all his other Dominions, and three Parts in four of his Money to his Brother John, reserving the rest for the Poor and his Domesticks. He had formerly at Messina settled Matters otherwise, and made his Nephew Arthur Duke of Brittany his Heir. This appears in his Letter from thence to the Pope, now to be seen in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But probably, the Fear of raising Commotions in his Dominions, made him alter his Mind. Indeed there could be no other Reason to induce him to favour his Brother, whom he had no Cause to love, to the Prejudice of his Nephew, whose Title was no less just than Prince John's. In his last Will he ordered his Body to be interred at Fontevraud, at the Feet of his Father, to testify his Sorrow for the many Uncharitableness he created him during his Life. His Heart was to be carried to Roa, for a Testimony of his Affection to the Normans. But his Bowels he ordered to be sent into Poitou, delighting to show by that little Esteem for the Poitouois, with whom he was displeased. He left only a natural Son called Philip, to whom he bequeathed the Lordship of Cognac in the Duchy of Guienne (1).

Such was the Life and Death of this valiant Prince, who for the Greatness of his Courage was named Cœur de Lion. After commending his Valour, which was something like a brutish Fierceness, in vain do we seek in him some other Virtue to afford Matter for his Panegyrick. Those that praise him for his Bounty and Magnificence, do not consider, if he was liberal and splendid, it was at the Expence of his Subjects, from whom he extorted several large Sums by unjustifiable Means. But on the other hand, we find in him abundance of Vices, and some of the most enormous. His Rebellion against his own Father is a Blemish, may justly be cast on his Memory. It is even apparent, God was pleased to punish him for it, by a continual Scene of Troubles during his ten Years Reign, and particularly by a fifteen Months Captivity. We find likewise in this Prince an insatiable Love of Money, which proved the Cause of his Death: A Pride, which made him look upon his Equals with Contempt, and his Inferiors as Slaves. In fine, if what certain Historians say of him be true, an unbridled Lust hurried him, not only to neglect the Queen his Wife, in order to abandon himself to an infamous Debauchery, but even to Sins against Nature. It is affirmed, a poor Hermit took the freedom to upbraid him with that detestable Crime before his whole Court, and conjure him, in the Name of God, to reflect on the Destruction of Sodom. Be this as it will, all those that have wit his Life, agree, that Pride, Avarice and Lust were his three reigning Vices. It is said, that being one Day admonished by Fulk, Curate of Nevilly (2), a Man famous for his Zeal, to throw off those wicked Habits, which were commonly called his Three Daughters, he replied jestingly, that it was his Design; and to that end he resolved to give the first to the Templars, the second to the Monks, and the third to the Bishops.

Richard was tall and well made. His Eyes were blue, and sparkling, and his Hair of a bright Yellow, inclining to Red. It may be said that England, where he reigned was above eight Months, during the whole Course of his Reign, which lasted near ten Years, was very unhappy under his Government. He loaded his Subjects with frequent Impositions and excessive Taxes. And yet no other Benefit accrued to the People for these prodigious Sums, but a little Glory for their King, with which however they were satisfied, as redounding to the Honour of the Nation.

It is remarked as a thing deserving particular notice, that this Prince, who restored the Use of the Crofs-Bow, received his Death's Wound from that Instrument, as if Heaven intended to punish him for reviving that diabolical Invention. But I question whether this Remark is built on a good Foundation. We have observed the English made use of the Crofs-Bow in the Conquest of Ireland, in the Reign of Henry II, and it is not likely they should discontinue it, in the few Years that were since passed.

Richard was the first King of England, who carried in his Shield Three Lions Passant, wherein he was imitated by his Successors (3).

During this Reign, the City of London began to put on a new Face with respect to its Government (4), and was divided into several Corporations or Societies, or as they are called at present, Companies (5).

(3) See the great Seal of each King in Sandford and Speed. It does not appear that the Norman Kings of England, Richard's Predecessors, bore any Arms, at least such as are ascribed to them. This is attested by a learned Antiquary. "I cannot find, (says he) either by Monuments, Coins, or Seals, or any contemporary Author, that such Arms as are ascribed to these Norman Kings, were in use with these several Princes, but that following Ages did assign of fix terms upon the Norman Later, to distinguish it from the succeeding Plantagenets, that did bear Gules, three Lions, or pale, or gules, or. Sandford Gen. Hist. p. 1. In, or about this time, Crests of Arms came also to be hereditary in Families: They owed their Origin to the Badges, which People painted, for distinction sake, upon their Shields, or Coats of Armour, in those mad Expeditions to the East, called the Crusades. Rebellion of John's Right to Richard's Succession.

HOUGH Richard made the Prince his Brother Heir to all his Dominions, John's Right was not thereby rendered incontestable. How absolute forever a Prince may be in his Life-time, as soon as his Eyes are closed, his last Will is no further regarded, than as consonant to the Laws, unless supported by Force.

In the Affair of the noble Succession, Richard left by his Decease, two Queries offered, not easy to be decided. The first was, whether, according to Law, Arthur Duke of Bretagne, as representing his Father Geoffrey, elder Brother of John, had as much or more Right than his Uncle John, who was one Degree nearer. In the second Query, the Business was to know, whether in case the Laws favoured the Nephew, Richard had Power to dispose of his Dominions by a Will contrary Custom.

Two things rendered the Decision of these Queries exceeding difficult: First, the Diversity between the Laws of the several States, this Succession consisted of. Secondly, in the Kingdom of England, the largest and most considerable part, there was no settled Law concerning the Succession to the Crown, by which the Kings were allowed or debarred the Power of disposing of it as they pleased. And if, for want of such a Law, the English History had been searched for Examples to establish a Precedent, that Method would have been no less perplexing. From the Conquest to the time I am speaking of, there had been no occasion to establish or exclude the Right of Representation in respect to the Crown. It is very true, that in running over the Times of the Saxon Empire, several Instances might have been found, but as there were others directly opposite, it was not easy to decide the Matter from thence. Besides it was now above a hundred Years since the Saxon Laws and Customs were in Force, the Normans having introduced a new System into the Kingdom. The strongest Argument in favour of John was, that, there being no established Law concerning this Matter, his Title was as good as Arthur's; and moreover, he had for him King Richard's Will. But on the other hand, in most of the Provinces possessed by the English in France, the Right of Representation in the lineal Descent was generally received: This Affair therefore would have been liable to great Discussions, had it been to be determined in a Court of Justice, or in the General Assembly of the States, by an impartial Judgment. But John not thinking proper to commit his Right to the Decision of any Tribunal, took a Course, which to him seemed not so uncertain. He believed his Right indisputable, or perhaps his Ambition would not permit him to be more scrupulous to his Nephew, than he had been with regard to the King his Brother. Be this as it will, he judged that Diligence was a more effectual Means to gain his Point than a Decision which might be to his Disadvantage. He had with him beyond Sea, two Men, who seemed proper Instruments for his Designs, by reason of their great Interest in England. The first was Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, the other William Marshal, afterwards Earl of Pembroke. These two Lords being wholly devoted to his Service, because they believed his Title good, or for other private Reasons, promised to use all their Credit in his Favour. Not to lose Time, which to him was so pre-thirteen Years of Age. Her high Spirit would have made her a truly worthy in the had been the first of her Father's Daughters in the world.

The first Part of her Education, raised him with Zeal and success. The Jactancy and great Power during the Interregnum. The Archbishop was at the Head of the Clergy. Blanch was exceedingly beloved and respected in the Kingdom; and William Marshal was a great favourite. By his Merit though not yet by his Influence, after concerting together the proper Measures to settle the Peace effectually, they laboured to gain the Assistance of the Clergy and Nobles (1). Then Aimed by their Help to win the People, that they might not be so much with less Opposition from the Nobles. Their Labour, being crowned with all the Success they expected, they thought themselves sufficiently strong to undertake the humbling the lesser Nobility to take the Oath to John. There were but few that refused it, both because they imagined it agreeable to the general Sentiment of the Nation, and were unacquainted with the young Duke of Burgundy, who had never been in England. Their two first Steps being taken, the Bishops and Barons were summoned to take the same Oath. But these were not so easily managed. Besides that many questioned whether John's Pretensions were just, they looked upon themselves as the proper Judges in the Affair, instead of being obliged to submit to the Decisions of others. However, as the Body of the People had now declared for John, they did not think themselves in a condition absolutely to refuse taking the required Oath. Accordingly, on pretence of examining into the Laws of the Realm, they demanded a Delay. In the mean time, believing a Civil War unavoidable, they began to fortify their Castles (2), and make Preparations to support the most just Cause, or at least, that which to them seemed most agreeable to their Interest. These Proceedings alarmed the Prince's Friends. As they knew he was not beloved, they were apprehensive, the Barons were determined to oppose him. To prevent this Design they convened at Northampton an Assembly General, where they used their utmost Endeavours to gain those they most suspected (3). Among other things, they promised in John's Name, that he would fully restore all the Rights, and Privileges of the Nobles and People. This Promise, joined to others privately made to the most obstinate, produced the Effect they expected. All the Lords unanimously engaged to swear Fealty to John, and by that means the whole Kingdom was well disposed in his favour before his Arrival. An Embassy sent at this Time from the King of France to demand Northumberland (4), gave some Uneasiness to those that were at the Helm. They were afraid, he intended to take Advantage of so favorable a Juncture to become Master of that Country, as indeed, it would have been very easy, England not being then in Condition to maintain a War. However, they found means to content the Ambassadors with fair Words, promising them, as soon as John was arrived, he would give them their Master Satisfaction.

Whilst John's Adherents were labouring for him in England, he himself was not idle in France, where he was detained by two important Affairs. The first was a Negotiation with Robert of Turnham, who had the Custody of Richard's Treasure in the Castle of Chinon, of which he was willing to see the Issue, before he crossed the Sea. He was at length so fortunate as to gain that Officer, who delivered him the Money in his keeping, and surrendered to him the two important Cities of Saumur and Chinon, of which he was Governour (5). The other Affair which kept John beyond Sea, was to cause himself to be owned for Sovereign by the Provinces the English held in France. Though in England every thing went to his Wish, it was not so in France, where young Arthur his Nephew created him great Uneasiness. Besides his natural Right to these Provinces, it was to be feared, the King of France would assist him with all his Force: to take possession. And indeed, nothing could be more advantageous for that Monarch, than to see them rent from the English Monarchy. Moreover, all seemed inclined to favour Arthur. The Governor of Angers (6) had already delivered that Place to him, and all the Lords of Poitou, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou, were resolved to acknowledge him for Sovereign (7). So that John now law himself as it were excluded from a great Part of his Brother's Inheritance. As this Example might prove a dangerous Consequence with regard to Normandy, and even have some Influence on Flanders, John was in great Anxiety. However, as he had Richard's Treasures in his Hand, he resolutely used it to gain the principal Lords of Normandy. By the same Means, he raised an Army, and laid Siege to Alençon, which had sided with the Duke of Burgundy. This Place, not making a long Resistance, he believed it necessary to strike a Terror into the Normans, by an Effusion of Security, which should frighten them from declaring a rebellion. For that purpose, he ordered the Walls of Alençon to be razed, and the chief Burghers made Prisoners. These rigorous Proceedings had the desired Effect. However inclined the Normans were to John, they thought it prudent to submit to his Union, in order to avoid the impending Evils. As soon as they had taken this Resolution, John came to Rouen, where he was crowned Duke of Normandy (8) by the Archbishop of that City, who had been a great Infractum in disposing the People in his favour.

It was by no means proper for John to think of reducing the other Provinces in France, before he had taken possession of the Crown of England. Besides that a too long Delay might be prejudicial to him, so great an Undertaking would be impracticable, without the Assistance of the English. He was determined therefore to pass the Sea, and arriving at London the 25th of May (9), he caused himself to be crowned next Day in Westminster Abbey. Before the Ceremony began, Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury made the following Speech to the Lords and People assembled.

"NO Person can have a Right to the Crown of this Kingdom, unless, after humbly invoking God's Holy Spirit, he be first unanimously elected for his extraordinary Virtues, and then solemnly anointed King after the Example of Saul and David, whom God was pleased to set over his People, though neither was Son of a King, or royally descended. The former was chosen for his Valour, the latter for his Humility and Piety; it pleased God that such as were to be clothed with Sovereign Power, should be eminently distinguished by their Virtues. If therefore any one of the Family of the late King excels the rest, we ought readily to consent to his Election. I speak this in favour of the noble Duke John here present, Brother to our illustrious King Richard, who died without Issue. This Prince, being endowed with all sorts of Virtues, and particularly with great Valour and Prudence, as well in respect of his Merits as Birth, with the Invocation of the Holy Spirit, we elect King."

After this short Harangue, the Archbishop set the Crown on John's Head, having first administered to him the customary Oath. The Bishop of Durham protested against the Coronation, as done in the Absence of the Archbishop of York. But this Pretension being founded neither on Law nor Custom, was not regarded.

The Archbishop of Canterbury's Speech well deserves some Remarks. Several pretend to prove from thence, that by Election only the Kings of England in those Days ascended the Throne. They ground their Opinion upon the Archbishop's declaring it, on so solemn an occasion without any Opposition. They urge likewise the Silence of the Prince elected, who must have been offended at so bold an Assertion, if he had not been satisfied, the People had such a Right. But I do not see how this Consequence can be drawn. Hubert takes upon him to declare, John comes to the Crown only by Election, without the States appearing to have been first consulted about it. Nay, it does not appear, that after he had ended his Speech, he so much as asked the Assembly's Opinion; but proceeded immediately to the Coronation of the King, upon the People's Acclamations, who were got together to see the Ceremony. Besides, if John was elected at that time, whence is it that all England had already sworn Fealty to him? Was it usual to take the Oath before the Election? Do we find any such thing practised in Elective Kingdoms? Moreover, if the Right of Election was then established in England, what made the Archbishop alledge the Ex-

1199. amplexes of Saul and David? Would it not have been more to the Purpose to produce those of the former Kings of England? But of these he says not a Word. He contents himself with insinuating upon the Examples of two Kings of Israel, much more proper to establish a new Right than to prove its Antiquity. There are even some Authors that affirm, 'the whole Assembly was extremely surprized at the Archbishop's Discourse: Adding, that after the Ceremony, being asked the Reason of so extraordinary a Proceeding, he replied, That he foresaw John would bring the Kingdom into great Confusion, and therefore had judged it proper to let him know, that he mounted the Throne by ELECTION, and not by HEREDITARY SUCCESSION, to the end he might always remember, that those who gave him the Crown had likewise the Power to take it away. If this particular was certain, the Right of Election would be overthrown by the Archbishop's own Words. For there is no need of any private Reasons for the use of a Right, when it is certainly established. But it is not likely that Hubert had the Gift of foreseeing what did not happen till several Years after.

To understand the Motive of this Speech, we need only consider the Circumstances of this pretended Election. Hubert, as was said, was entirely in John's Interests. The Business was to procure that Prince a Crown, to which the Duke of Bretagne had Pretensions, not altogether groundless. However, by Promises or Threats the English were brought to swear to John. It was not therefore proper to say, he ascended the Throne by Hereditary Right, since the question between him and Arthur had been neither examined nor decided. Consequently it would have been acting contrary to John's Interest to revive it. But it was very advantageous to him to mount the Throne by a sort of Election, upon a double account. First, as it gave him a Title to his Coronation: Secondly, as it gained him the People of England, who were thereby more likely to support their Choice, than maintain him in his pretended Hereditary Right, which was liable to many difficulties.

John was thirty two years of Age when he came to the Throne, so much desired Crown, but which, by the just Judgment of God, served only to render him more unhappy. During the whole Course of his Reign, he met with nothing but Misfortunes, and those the most terrible; having to deal with three irreconcilable Enemies, namely, Philip Augustus King of France, Pope Innocent III., and the Barons of his own Realm. The first stript him of almost all the Provinces held by his Predecessors in France. The second wrested from him the Crown of England, and though he restored it afterwards, it was upon the Terms of a dishonorable Homage. In fine, the Barons of England compelled him to give up all the Prerogatives enjoyed by his Predecessors since William the Conqueror. These are the three principal Events of this Reign, the Particulars whereof I am going to relate as briefly as the Subject will permit.

As soon as John was crowned (1), his first Care was to reward those who had been instrumental in placing him on the Throne. William Marshal was created Earl of Pembroke; Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the Justiciary, received the Title of Earl of Essex: Archbishop Hubert considered as a Recompence, the Office of High-Chancellor, conferred on him by the King; though many were of Opinion, his accepting it was a Disparagement to his Ecclesiastical Dignity. Indeed, Chancellors had been made Archbishops of Canterbury, for Instance, Thomas Becket; but this was the first time an Archbishop was invested with the Chancellorship.

The new King being secure of the English, stayed no longer in the Kingdom than was necessary to amuse the King of Scotland. This Prince was very urgent for the Restitution of Northumberland and Cumberland, and threatened to carry War into those Counties, unless he had speedy Satisfaction. John had no design to comply with his Demands, but however did not think proper to reject them at such a juncture. To free himself from this difficulty, he chose to persuade him gently to be satisfied with a general Promise, till his urgent Affairs in France permitted him to enter into Negotiation with him (2). Indeed, this was his only Course, since he could not relinquish his Affairs in France without danger of losing all.

Constance, Mother of Arthur, perceived by John's Proceedings, that he designed to seize all the Provinces in France possessed by Henry II. and Richard. But as she found herself unable to oppose it, she resolved to put the Duke her Son under the King of France's Protection. To that end, she desired that Monarch to give her a Meeting at Tours, where she delivered the young Duke into his Hands (3), surrendering to him withal, the principal Places of Bretagne, Touraine, Poitou, Anjou and Maine, to hold them for Arthur.

Philip desired nothing so much as the Recovery of the Provinces enjoyed by the English in France. He had even undertaken several Wars to that end, though with little Success. It is no wonder therefore, if he did not fail to embrace so favorable an opportunity. Under colour of acting for Arthur, he had now broke the five years Truce made with Richard. He had even made himself Master of Evreux, and the Province of Maine, whilst the Bretons had surprized Angers, from whence Morched, King John's General, had driven them a little before. News of these Things being brought to England, John caused John to depart with Precipitation, to look after his Affairs beyond Sea (4). Upon his Arrival at Roan (5), he assembled an Army of English and Normans, which was quickly reinforced with the Troops brought by the Lords of his Party from the other Provinces. This great Armament surprized Philip. As he was unwilling to run any hazard, he pretended to desire to end his Differences with the King of England by way of Negotiation, and for that purpose demanded a Truce for fifty days. Instead of improving his Advantages, John suffered himself to be deceived by his Enemy, and granted him a Truce. He imagined, the Terror of his Arms obliged the King of France to desist from his Projects. Before the Truce was expired, the two Monarchs had an Interview between Butvant and Gaillon to try to adjust their Differences. Philip talked very high, and in such a strain as showed he was void of all Fear. He demanded the Norman-Vexin for himself, and Poitou, Anjou, Maine and Tourain for Arthur, for which Provinces he had now received that Prince's Homage. A demand so opposite to John's designs, breaking off the Conference, and causing to vanish all hopes of Peace, Hostilities commenced on both Sides.

Joanna Countess of Tholouse and Queen Dowager of Sicily, Sister of King John, died in the beginning of the War at Roan (6), where she was come to visit the King her Brother. She was buried at Pontevraud, in a very splendid manner, near the Kings Henry and Richard her Father and Brother.

Whilst John was taken up with his Sister's Funeral, Philip was in Bretagne, where he made himself Master of certain Places that had declared for John. Among these was the Castle of Balan (7), which Philip ordered to be demolished as soon as it was in his Power. This Proceeding offending William de la Roche, Governor of the young Duke, he complained of it as a Breach of the Treaty made with Philip, in the Name of his Pupil. Indeed, they had agreed that all the Places, taken from the Enemy, should be delivered into the Hands of the Duke, as soon as he came of Age. But instead of excusing the Thing from the Circumstances of the War, Philip scornfully replied, It was not to be expected that the Consideration of the Duke of Bretagne's Interest should hinder him from consulting his own. At the same time, without giving the Governor other Satisfaction, he marched on to besiege Lavardin. But upon King John's approach at the head of a numerous Army, he thought fit to retire into Maine. For the same Reason, he found himself obliged also to quit that Province and shelter himself in his own Dominions.

Mean time, what he had done in Bretagne, and his reply upon that occasion, opened the Eyes of William de la Roche. This prudent Governor, finding Philip had no other View than to use his young Master as an Instrument to advance his own Affairs, thought it his Duty to endeavour to blast his Designs. Accordingly, he carried away Constance and Arthur from the Court of Philip, and after a reconciliation, brought them to King John (8). This might have proved fatal to the King of France, if he had not by good Fortune, or perhaps by good Management, recovered his loss, which he looked upon as very necessary to serve as a Mask to his Ambition. There were some in the Court of King John, who, bribed by Philip, or out of Affection to the young Duke, intimated to Constance, that her own and her Son's Life were in danger near a Prince, who would be so great a gainer by their death. These Intimations often repeated, made such an Impression on the Princess and the young Duke, that they privately withdrew from King John's Court, and threw themselves into the Arms of their former Protector.

John's Return furnished Philip with a plausible Pretence to continue the War, it caused John to lose all the hopes he had entertained, whilst the young Prince was in his Custody. In all appearance, the War was like to be of long Continuance. John had strengthened himself with the Alliance of the Emperor Otto of Saxony his Nephew, who promised to make a powerful Division in his favour. He had likewise gained the Earl of Flanders, and by an unexpected Turn, all Guienne had just declared for him. All these Advantages were sufficient to enable him to carry on the War without dreading his Enemy. The Province of Guienne was so considerable, that John immediately laid aside his other designs to go and take possession.

His Affairs standing thus, he had reason to flatter himself with the hopes of Success in the Continuation of the War. However he chose rather to listen to the Proposals of Peace, intimated to him from Philip by the Cardinal of Capua. The King, numerous Forces, his Alliance with the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders, and the Succours he might expect from the Gascons, made Philip sensible it would not be possible at such a juncture to make any great Progress. And therefore, finding the War promised him no advantage, he turned about to procure by a Peace, what he could not expect by Arms. As he considered the young Duke of Bretagne's Interests, only with a view to his own, he readily relinquished that Prince, to obtain the better Terms for himself. After a short Truce, which brought on a Treaty, a Peace was concluded (1) by the Mediation of the Cardinal of Capua, the Pope's Legate, upon these Conditions:

That Philip should give no assistance to the Duke of Bretagne, but suffer John to take possession of Poitou, Maine, Tourain, and Anjou, without Molestation.

That he should restore to John the Earldom of York, Berry, Auvergne, and in general whatever was taken from the English since Richard's Death.

That immediately after the Restitution of Berry and Auvergne, John should resign those two Provinces, for a certain time, to Prince Lewis Son of Philip, and pay him twenty thousand (2) Marks of Silver for the Dowry of Blanche of Castile his Niece (3), whom that Prince was to marry.

That in case John died without Issue, he should leave these two Provinces to Lewis.

That John should not assist, directly, or indirectly, the Emperor Otto his Nephew, who was at War with France.

This Treaty was fatal to the Duke of Bretagne. The young Prince finding he was too weak to resist the King his Uncle, without the Assistance of France, quickly lost all the Provinces that had declared for him. Nay, he gave himself obliged to do Homage for Bretagne to King John, as his Predecessors had always done to the Dukes of Normandy. However, though the King, of France had thus deserted him, he chose rather to stay with him, than to trust himself with an Uncle, of whom he had entertained a Suspicion, which could not be blotted out of his Mind.

As soon as the Peace was signed, Queen Eleanor set out for Spain to fetch Blanche of Castile her Grand-Daughter, who was to be married to Prince Lewis. As the Kingdom of France was then under an Interdict, she conducted the young Princess to Reims, where the Nuptials were solemnized. All the Articles of the Treaty being executed, except the delivery of Berry and Auvergne, to the Prince of France, John faithfully performed his Engagement. Thus the two Courts parted, in appearance, in perfect Union.

Mean while the Emperor, offended at the Peace made without consulting him, sent Ambassadors to the King his Uncle to upbraid him, and to demand withal some Jewels, left him by King Richard in his Will (4). But as John had no farther occasion for his Assistance, he found Reasons or Pretences to dispense with giving him Satisfaction.

It John faithfully executed his part of the Treaty, Philip was no less punctual to perform whatever he had promised. He beheld with a seeming Unconcern, the Progress of the King of England, who taking advantage of Arthur's Weakness, disposed him of all the Provinces that were given him Bretagne alone, to which John could lay no manner of Claim, remained in Subjection to the Duke.

But whilst John was making all these Conquests, he himself was vanquished by the Charms of Isabella of Angoulême, one of the greatest Beauties in her time. She had been contracted to Hugh Earl of Marche. But, being then too young, the Marriage was not consummated. Several Obstacles afterwards intervened, which prevented the Consummation, though the Contract still remained in Force. The violent Passion John entertained for this Lady, made him with all imaginable Ardor seek means to possess her. But his ends could not be attained without very great Difficulties. There were no less than two Marriages to break through at once, namely, his own with Isabella of Ghent, (who during the nine Years they they had been together, had never given him any Cause to complain,) and That of Isabella, with the Earl of Marche. However, his new Passion putting him in mind, that Isabella was related to him within the Degrees forbidden by the Canons, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury protested against his Marriage, he desired the Pope to annul it. Whether the Pope was willing to do the King a Pleasure, or was glad of an occasion to exert the Authority of the Church, he appointed the Archbishop of Bourdeaux and two other Bishops, Judges of the Cause. After a slender Examination, the Commissioners declared John's Marriage with Isabella, null and void; which done, the King demanded Isabella of the Earl of Angoulême her Father, who gave her to him, without scrupling to break his Word, to procure a Crown for his Daughter.

In this Manner most Historians, speak of John's second Marriage. They ascribe his Love for Isabella of Angoulême, was the real Motive of his annulling the first (5). There is one however, who undertakes to vindicate the King, by intimating that Isabella was divorced before his Passion for Isabella. But I question whether the Authority of a single Historian can outweigh the Testimony of all the rest (6).

A little after the King's Marriage, Constance of Bretagne, who was married to Ralph Earl of Chyler, having lost her second Husband, or, as some say, voluntarily, quitted him, espoused for her third Guy de Thonars. She died in 1201, having lived about a Year with her new Spouse. By this third Marriage she left a Daughter called Alice, who was Dutchess of Bretagne, after the Death of her Brother Arthur.

John thought himself happy in obtaining for a moderate Sum, and the Renunciation of Berry and Auvergne, the Provinces in France, enjoyed by his Ancestors. But the English deemed the Treaty dishonorable, that they could not forbear murmuring. They considered their King as a foolish and cowardly Prince, who was so mean-spirited as to purchase a Peace, when all things seemed to promise him a good issue of the War. But these Murmurs gave him but little Uneasiness. He imagined he had done enough, in depriving the Duke his Nephew of the Protection of France, and reducing him to Bretagne alone, of which also he did not despair of one Day dispossessing him.

As soon as he had settled his Affairs in France, and John secured his new Acquisitions, he returned to England (7). There, where presently after he convened an Assembly or Parliament, and demanded an Aid of three Shillings upon every Hide of Land, for the Dowry of Blanche of Castile his Niece, according to his Agreement with Philip. This demand met at first with great Opposition. People could not understand what Business the English had to pay the Dowry of a Spanish Princess, to marry her to a French Prince. Nevertheless, as it was the first Aid he had demanded, it was not thought proper to deny it. But it was confessed to with so much Reluctance, that he easily saw how difficult it would be for the future to raise Money upon the People, unless he rendered himself absolute. And this, it is pretended, he began from that time to labour to effect.

Mean while, Geoffrey his natural Brother, who was Archbishop of York, making light of the Consent of the States for this Tax, forbade the Collectors to levy it within his Diocese. Nothing could be more groundless than the Archbishop's Pretensions. He had no Right to oppose what was resolved by the Body of the Nation. But he was a turbulent and ambitious Person, who wanting to set himself forward, would have been very glad to find himself seconded John never expiated to meet with opposition from that Pielate, after the signal Service he had done him during Richard's Absence, in delivering him from Prison, and openly espousing his Cause against Long-Clamp. But however, notwithstanding the Reason he had to be dispensed with him, he was willing to use him gently, and therefore was contented with requiring him to attend him in France, imagining that, by his Absence, this Affair would fall to the Ground. But the Archbishop refusing to comply with his Orders, furnished the King with a Pretence to seize his Temporalities. This Punishment was not capable of humbling his daring Spirit. He excommunicated the Sheriff of the County of York (1), with all his Officers employed in levying the Tax, and laid his whole Diocese under an Interdict, because the People were not forward to support him. He flattered himself that the whole Kingdom would be ready to declare for him. But when he saw no body stir, and himself left to act alone, he sought means to be reconciled to the King. The present juncture was favorable to him. John, being about to be crowned with his new Queen (2), thought it unbecoming, at such a Season, to refuse a Brother the Pardon he desired.

Immediately after the King's Coronation, Hugh Bishop of Lincoln dyed at London, with the Reputation of Sanctity.

Since the Death of Richards, the King of Scotland was very importunate for the Restitution of the two Counties to which he laid Claim. He had been often aunted with general Promises, that were never performed. At length, finding there was no haste made to content him, he openly threatened to do himself Justice by Force of Arms. Whereupon, John could no longer refuse to set about this Affair, which began to make him uneasy. But, instead of treating by Ambassadors, he believed he should do better by talking in Person with William; for that Purpose desired him to come to Utrecht (2), where he went him-fell to meet him. Before this Negotiation began (4) John required William to do him Homage. To which William consenting, the Ceremony was performed on the Hill (5) without the City, in the Presence of the Archbishop of York, who administered the Oath of Fealty to the Vassal King. It is not known for what Lands William did this Homage. As the Scotch Writers have not positively determined the Matter, the English infer it was for the whole Kingdom of Scotland. But this Inference is not altogether just. Besides, it is unlikely this Prince should voluntarily return to the Vassalage, from which he had been freed by King Richard, before his departure for the Holy Land. And indeed it does not appear, there was any Alteration in this Respect, since Richard by an authentick Charter had renounced his Right of Sovereignty over Scotland. Be this as it will, the Homage being done, the King of Scotland would have moved his Affairs, but the King had the Address to refer till another time, pretending he could do nothing without the Consent of the States (6). He even obliged William to swear he would not marry his Daughter without his Approbation.

Whilst these two Monarchs were at Lincoln, the Body of Hugh, late Bishop of that City, being removed thither from London, they both went forth to meet it, and for some time bore the Coffin on their Shoulders.

It was rare likewise that the Cistercians, who refused to pay the late Tax, sent to the King twelve Abbots, who falling prostrate at his Feet, humbly implored his Mercy. The King, struck with the Sight, fell on his Knees and asked their Blessing, promising them to found an Abbey for their Order. Some time after he performed his Promise, and built the Abby of Bewley, called by some Beaulieu in Hants, where he endowed with the Privilege of Sanctuary, and with large Revenues.

The Respect shown by Jahn to the Body of the Bishop of Lincoln, and his Condescension for the Cistercian Monks were not sufficient to gain him the Affection of the Clergy. He fancied, the Ecclesiasticks, prepossessed in his Favour by the late Professions of his Attachment to the Church, would indifferently decline all Occasions of creating him Unacceptable. But it was not long before he was sensible his Proceedings, had not the Effect he expected. The See of Lincoln being vacant, the King, according to the Custom of his Ancestors, recommended a Person to the Canons of that Church. But though the Prince's Nomination had till then been always regarded, this was rejected with out-gious Contempt, the Refusal not being foisted with the least Civility. 7). Innocent III. who sat then in the Papal Chair, having resolved to deprive Princes of their share in the Elections of Bishops and Abbots, had taken measures beforehand to cause the King's Nomination to be rejected. For this reason doublets, finding themselves secure of the Pope's Protection, the Canons showed so little Regard for their Sovereign.

Some time after, John received a fresh Mortification. Hibert ^{at a Synod, ex-} ^{communicating} ^{the King's} ^{Prælat. torn} ^{M. V. 121.} ^{Hoved.} ^{p. 806.} Archbishop of Canterbury, who had exprest so great an Attachment for him, lost it when the Rights of the Clergy, and the Privileges of his See, came to be supported. Hitherto there had been no Synod held in England without the King's Licence. This was a Difference paid the King without being thought injurious to the Church or Clergy. But it seems Innocent III. mounting the papal Throne at thirty five Years of Age, found the Project of depriving Princes of every thing that looked like Jurisdiction over the Church. Hibert, informed of this Design, and directed by the Pope, began the first to disregard the King's Commands. He not only convened a Synod without asking his Leave, but even held it notwithstanding the King's positive Prohibition by his Jactancy (8). In all Appearance, the little Reframent exprest by the King at this Boldness, was very prejudicial to him afterwards. It was easy to see, that, terrified by the Example of the King his Father, he resolved to avoid all occasions of quarrel with the Clergy. His Enemies made a very ill use of this Knowledge on more important Occasions. Hibert, not content with thus fighting the Orders of his Sovereign, endeavoured to equal him in some measure, and even to surpass him in Magnificence. Whilst the King was celebrating the Feast of Christmas at Gulstard with great Solemnity, the Archbishop affected to do the same thing at Canterbury, with such Pomp and Splendor that the King was piqued at it, and considered it as a Sort of Bravado. To punish in some measure the Archbishop's Vanity, he caused himself to be crowned again at Canterbury, with the sole View of putting him to a very great Expence. But this petty Revenge served only to show how much the King dreaded to attack directly those who were in Credit.

If the Treaty John had not been in Effect, gave his Subjects an ill Opinion of him, his Behaviour after his return into England did not help to undeceive them. Most of the Barons were not over-fatigued of the Goodness of his Title to the Crown. If they had taken the Oath to him, it was upon condition he would restore the Privileges of the Nobles and People. But in vain had they expected the Performance of this Promise, ever since he was clear of the War, wherein he was at first engaged. On the contrary, they saw him daily usurping an arbitrary Power, which made them apprehensive of a Design upon their Liberties. They were now highly displeased with the Aid, he had obtained by a fort of Compulsion. After that, he was seen to take a Progress into the North, where on pretence of Trespasses on his Forfeits he had contrary to the Privileges of the People, arbitrarily exacted large Sums from the northern Counties. To all this he added fresh occasions of Complaint, by debauching their Wives and Daughters, without regard to the Quality or Merit of those that were dishonoured by these Actions. All these things together bred in the minds of the Barons a Prejudice against him, which induced them by degrees to take measures to avoid greater Evils, which they believed themselves threatened with. They began to hold private Conferences, where they agreed mutually to assist each other, in case any one should be oppressed. At those Conferences it was resolved to embrace the first Opportunity, to let the King know they never intended to submit to an absolute Power. An Opportunity presented sooner than they expected. The Palatines revolting and the King desirous to go and chastise them, summoned all the Barons to appear with their Arms at Parliament (9), to attend him into France. The Barons looking upon this as a favorable Juncture, assembled at Leicester on some Pretence. A few days after they sent this Message to the King, That before they went over with him, they expected he should restore to them their Privileges, pursuant to his Promise before his Coronation. John was of an impetuous Temper, more capable of being governed by Counsels, agreeable to his Passions, than of listening to sober Advice. Several of his Ministers desired him to give the Barons some Satisfaction, or at least some fair promises till their Heat was somewhat abated. But he was not so wife or so fortunate as to follow their wholesome Advice. He was so provoked at the Insolence of the Barons, that, without considering he was going to draw on himself their hatred, by his violent measures, he divided of them their Castles as Pledges of their Fidelity. At the same time he marched himself, at the head of some Troops, against Beauvoir Castle, which he took in a few Days (1). This first success justifying the Barons, who had not yet taken any measures for their Defence, they saw themselves under a necessity of submitting, and, having put their Children into his hands as Hostages, came to Portsmouth. Whether John pretended to go and chastise the Peisievins, in order to have a pretence to raise Money upon the Nobility, or was afraid to leave the Kingdom at such a Juncture, he dispensed with the Barons attendance, for two Marks of Silver upon every [Knight.] &c. However, he sent the Earl of Penbrooke (2) with some Troops into Normandy, and followed him in Person (3), as soon as he thought he might do it with Safety.

Upon his Arrival at Raan, Philip desired to have a Conference with him, in which he gave him such Marks of Esteem and Friendship, that a Prince of greater Penetration than John, would have been deceived. At this Interview the Treaty was renewed, and several great Lords of both Courts were reciprocally made Sureties, who promised to serve against the Aggressor, in case of a Rupture between the two Kings. But such Engagements, though very common in those Days, were hardly ever observed. And therefore Princes have long since ceased to give one another the like Securities, which they have so often found to be unserviceable. Before they parted, the two Monarchs agreed to contribute the fortieth Part of their Revenues to the Holy War; and exhorted the wealthiest of their Subjects to follow their Examples. Philip, not content with caressing John in an extraordinary manner, desired the favour of his Company for some Days at Paris, where he lodged him in his own Palace. In short, he omitted nothing to convince him he had a real Affection for him (4).

The Friendship which the two Monarchs had mutually sworn to preserve, seemed indeed likely to prove firm and lasting, since their Engagement was entirely voluntary. And yet, it quickly appeared, that Philip's Caresses to his pretended Friend, were only to ensnare him. At the very time, he was giving him all these Marks of Affection, he was projecting to deprive him of all his Dominions in France. Hugh Earl of Marche, was his Instrument to begin to bring Matters to the point he desired. This Earl could not without extreme concern, see John in possession of a Lady that was designed for him. To this was added a deep Repentment of the Injury received. These Things gave room to presume, he would eagerly embrace any opportunity of being revenged. Philip forming his Scheme upon the Earl of Marche's Inclination, spared no Pains to excite him to revenge, assuring him of a powerful Assistance. As soon as the Earl was secure of the Protection of France, he began by secret Cabals to corrupt the Peisievins. He succeeded so well, that in a short time they were all ready to rebel against King John, for whom they had no Affection. Upon which Hugh, applying himself to the young Duke of Bretagne, gave him to understand, the time was come, that he might with ease wrest from his Uncle the Provinces he had seized. Arthur being informed by the Earl, that the King of France had engaged to support him, was of opinion he ought to embrace so favorable an opportunity. The Bretons, his Subjects, readily joined in the Conspiracy, by reason of their good opinion of their Prince. They imagined, his Name was a good Omen, and for no other reason verily believed, he would gain as great a Reputation as the famous Arthur, whose Name he bore. Thus the Love, Jealousy and Repentment of the Earl of Marche, the Ambition of Arthur, and the Avarice of Philip, conspired to King John's ruin. Mean while, he spent his time in Diversions and Entertainments with his new Queen, without the least suspicion of danger. He was roused out of this supine Carelessness, by Philip's haughty Treatment at a second Interview near Gallion. The French Monarch, whose Matters were ripe, talked very high. He demanded for Arthur all King John's Provinces in France, with reason and Satisfaction for the Earl of Marche; and in case of refusal, summoned him to appear before the Court of Peers, and abide by their Judgment. John was extremely surprized to hear him talk in so different a Strain from what he had done at their late Interview. As he did not think his Affairs were in so bad a Situation as to be obliged to purchase a Peace upon such hard Terms, he refused to comply with Philip's demands, and disdained his Citation. His refusal furnished the King of France with the pretence he wanted to invade Normandy, where he took several Places (5) before John could oppose his Progress.

Towards the middle of Autumn, Philip satisfied with his first Campaign, returned to Paris, where he celebrated the Nuptials of Mary his eldest Daughter with Arthur. His Aim was thereby to justify his present Undertaking, under colour of maintaining the Cause of his Son-in-law. A few Days after, Arthur departed, attended with two hundred Lances, to take upon him the Command of the revolted Peisievins. When he came near Poitiers, he was informed, that Queen Eleanor his Grandmother was in Mirabel with a weak Garrison, upon which, resolving to surprize that Place, he marched directly thither (6), and soon became master of the Town. But it was otherwise with the Castle, where the Queen was retired.

The Resistance he met with, making him sensible it would be difficult to carry the Place with so few Troops, he called the Earl of Marche to his Assistance, who ran to the Expedition, as to a certain Victory.

Mean time, King John, who had received Intelligence of his Mother's danger, was marching Day and Night to her Relief. His speed was such, that he approached his Enemies before they had made any great Progress in the Siege. However, it was in their Power to retreat, but the Animosity of the two Leaders against John, made them resolve to give him Battle. The Success answered not their Expectations. Upon the first Onset, John routed the Peisievins Troops, and drove them back to Mirabel, where he made a great Slaughter (7). This Victory was rendered still more complete by the taking of the Duke of Bretagne, the Princess Eleanor his Sister (8), the Earl of Marche, and two hundred Knights, who fell into the Hands of the Conqueror. John believed he had reason to rejoice at so favorable a Success. But the ill use he afterwards made of it, rendered it so fatal, that it would have been better for him to have been vanquished. Arthur was immediately sent to Falaife, and the Princess Eleanor his Sister to Brighthelm Castle in England, where she was confined forty years. Some of the French Writers give another Idea of this Action, and say only that Arthur was surprized in Mirabel, from whence it may be inferred that he went not out to fight his Uncle. But King John's Letter to England after the Victory, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, shows that it was something more than a surprize, and confirms what the English Historians say of it. Philip was so confounded at the News of Arthur and the Earl of Marche being made Prisoners, that he raised the Siege of Arques, begun some days before (9), and returned to Paris.

John was very impatient to see the Duke his Nephew, in order to persuade him to renounce the Protection of France. He hoped by that means to deprive Philip of the Pretence, he perpetually used to involve him in Wars. To that end, he immediately went back to Normandy, not at all questioning but Arthur, in his present Condition, would gladly embrace the opportunity of being reconciled to him. Upon his Arrival at Falaife, he caused him to be brought before him, and in a very kind and obliging manner, endeavored to persuade him to relinquish the King of France. He represented to him, that Philip, under colour of protecting him, had only his own Interest in view, and by his Conduct hitherto, it was easy to see what he was to expect from such a Protector. He tried to make him sensible, it was equally his Duty and Interest, to adhere to an Uncle, who found his own Advantage in supporting him, and desired nothing so much as to live in a good Understanding with him, and give him Marks of his Affection. In fine, he bid him consider that in his present Circumstances, his good or ill Fortune depended entirely on the Person that was suing for his Friendship. The young Prince, who was not yet well instructed in the Maxims of Politicks, the chief of which is Diffimulation, could not refuse to conceal his Sentiments. Instead of accepting the King's Offers, he took the freedom to upbraid him with usurping the Crown of England as well as the Provinces of France. Without considering that he lay at his Mercy, he was so transported with Passion, as to threaten, that to the last Moment of his Life he would never cease seeking occasion to be revenged. After he plain a Declaration, John despairing of overcoming his Obstinacy, ordered him to be conducted to Roan, and confined in the new Tower, under the Care of Robert de Vipont. It is pretended, that, pursuant to the Advice of some of his Counsellors, the King intended to put out his Eyes, and render him incapable of having Children, in order to free himself from all uneasiness on his account, but was disappointed by those who were to be the Agents. However this be, a few days after, the young Prince was brought to Roan, he disappeared on a sudden, and it could never be known for certain what became of him. The King's Friends reported, that Arthur, endeavouring to escape out of Prison, was drowned in the River Seine. But very few gave credit to this Report. On the contrary, it was the general opinion, the Prince was murdered by the Command of the King his Uncle (1). There are even some Historians (2) who relate the Circumstances of his death. They tell us, that John himself in a very dark Night came in a Boat to the foot of the Tower where his Nephew was in Custody, and causing him to be brought before him, stabbed him with his own hand, and ordered his Body to be thrown into the Seine, some Leagues below the Town (3). In whatever manner this Prince's death happened, it is certain John never fully cleared himself of it. There was too much the more reason to believe him guilty, as he made no Inquiry into it, which he should have done with great strictness, had he not been concerned.

The same Year the Pope demanded a fortieth Part of all the Ecclesiastical Revenues in England, towards the Charge of the Holy War.

Immediately after the death of Arthur, John returned into England, and caused himself to be crowned a fourth time (4), after which he repaired into Normandy. He found, the Report of the Duke of Bretagne's murder was every where spread, with Circumstances very injurious to his Reputation and Honour; and yet he was in no haste to discover the manner of the Prince's death. For which reason all the World was convinced, he himself was the Author of that barbarous Deed. The Bretons especially complained of the tragical death of their Sovereign. They maintained, if John did not kill him with his own hand, it was at least evident, the murder could not be committed without his Consent, or even his Orders. The King of France, who wanted to improve this Juncture, exasperated them as much as possible by means of his Emisaries. He caused it to be suggested to them, that in case they applied to him as John's Sovereign Lord, he would do them ample Justice. This was sufficient Encouragement to the Bretons, who burned with desire to revenge the death of their Duke. Guy de Thimari, Husband of the deceased Dutches, and Guardian of Anna's Daughter, assembled the Nobility of Bretagne at Parthenay upon this occasion. At this Meeting it was unanimously resolved to apply to the King of France for Justice. Pursuant to this Resolution, the Bishop of Rennes, and another Lord were commissioned to carry their Complaints to Philip, who gave them a very gracious Answer. He appeared more incensed against John than the Bretons themselves, and openly declared that neither Honour, nor Justice, nor Confidence would suffer him to let such a Parricide go unpunished. To show his Threats were not in vain, he himself demanded Justice of the Court of Peers, before whom he displayed the Barbarity of the Murder committed on the Body of the Duke of Bretagne, in a Place held of the Crown of France, and of which the King of England his Vassal was accused. It was not difficult to obtain whatever he desired. The Court ordered John to appear before them, and answer to what was laid to his Charge. Upon the Receipt of the Summons, John immediately dispatched Ambassadors to Philip (5), to represent to him, that their Master could not come to France without a Safe-Conduct; to which the King answered, He may come in Peace. But when the Ambassadors demanded a Safe-conduct for his Return, he roundly told them, that depended on the Sentence which should be passed upon him. Then the Ambassadors remonstrated, their Master was not only Duke of Normandy, but also King of England; and that he himself should think fit to expose his Person to so manifest a danger, the Barons of the Realm would never consent to it: What is that to me? replied Philip, is not the Duke of Normandy my Vassal? If he has then, he fit to acquire a higher Title, ought I upon that account to lose my Right of Sovereignty? The Ambassadors plainly perceiving Philip was resolved to push the Affair, retired without making any Answer, and returned with all speed to inform their Master how the Court of France had decided.

As soon as the time appointed in the Summons was expired, Philip caused John to be condemned for Non-appearance, and ordered all his Dominions in France to be united to the Crown. It is remarkable, that in the Sentence (6) there is not a word of the Satisfaction due to the Bretons for the death of their Sovereign, though they were Parties in the Affair, and Philip seemed to concern himself in it only upon their Account. This is a clear Evidence, his Aim was not so much to do them Justice, as to make use of this occasion to dispossess the Kings of England. The English loudly murmured at these Proceedings, and the more because the King being actually in War with France, he was under an absolute Necessity of not appearing, both by being summoned before Peace was concluded, and denied a Safe-conduct for his Return. But, without troubling himself about their Complaints, Philip endeavoured to put the Sentence in Execution (7).

Whilst the King of France was making his Preparations, John took no measures for his Defence. He preposterously considered the Sentence as a Bravado of Philip's, and not as a fixed Resolution to invade his Dominions. Mean while, as soon as the Season permitted, the King of France took the Field at the head of a powerful Army, and as he met with very little opposition, reduced the best part of Normandy to his Obedience. The Progress of his Army was uncapable of rousing John, who seeming insensibly

There, late in the Evening, followed only by a few, he got on Horse-back, making the Prince ride before him. Then leaving his Attendants behind, he went on along the Coast, till he had found a place fit for his purpose, which was a high Cliff hanging over the Sea. Being got there with the Prince, he spurred his Horse up to him, and with his Sword ran him through the Body, the poor Prince crying in vain for Mercy. Then done, he pulled him to the Ground, and digging him by the Feet to the Brink of the Precipice, flung him into the Sea, not being yet quite dead, nor was the Body ever seen afterwards. Hist. de France, c. 78, p. 211.

(7) This Year King John caused the following Affair of Bread to be proclaimed through the whole Kingdom. It was to be six pence for the Bakers might give in every Quarter Three-pence, besides the Bran, and two Loaves at the Oven; with the following Allowance: For four Shillings, two-pence; for two Bys, a Farthing; for Salt, a Half-penny; for Yeast, a Half-penny; for Candle, a Farthing; for Wood, three Farthings; for boiling, a Half-penny. Then follows the Affair. When Wheat is sold for six Shillings the Quarter, then a Farthing white Loaf, well baked, shall weigh sixteen Shillings; and a brown one of the same Price twenty four Shillings.

At five Shillings and Six-pence a Quarter, the Farthing white Loaf shall weigh twenty Shillings, and the Brown twenty-eight Shillings.

At five Shillings, the White twenty-four Shillings, the Brown thirty-two Shillings.

At four Shillings and Six-pence, the White thirty two Shillings, the Brown forty-two Shillings.

At four Shillings, the White thirty six Shillings, the Brown forty-six Shillings.

At three Shillings and Six-pence, the White forty-two Shillings, the Brown fifty-four Shillings.

At three Shillings, the White forty eight Shillings, the Brown sixty-four Shillings.

At two Shillings and Six-pence, the White fifty-four Shillings, the Brown seventy-two Shillings.

At two Shillings, the White sixty-two Shillings, the Brown eighty Shillings.

At Eighteen-pence, the White seventy-seven Shillings, the Brown four hundred eight Shillings.

The Reader, to have a right Not on of these Weights, is to take notice, That Silver was then but at Twenty-pence on Ounce, every Pound here at that time a Pound weight (whereas now every Pound of Silver makes three Pounds Sterling;) And accordingly, the Weight of every Shilling was then the twentieth part of a Pound. ble of his Losses, thought of nothing but his Diversions (1). As it is his Affairs had been in the most prosperous Condition. When News was brought him that Philip had taken such a Place, he only replied with great Confidence, I will not recover it again. However, without tiring from Rouen, or making the least Preparations, he gave his Enemy time to secure, and only enlarge his Conquests. In fine, he carried his Intemperance so far, that the People felt publicly, he was bewitched. It is easy to judge what difficulties Philip would have met with in his Undertaking, if he had been to deal with a less slothful Enemy, by the Resistance of one single Place called Giselle-Gaillard, which cost him a five Month's Siege (2).

The English Barons who carried the King into Normandy, earnestly besought him to exert himself. But finding he was deaf to all their Remonstrances, they returned to England, tired with being Witnesses of his invincible Sloth. Meantime, Philip taking Advantage of his Indolence, daily gained ground (3). Not content with what he obtained by his Arms, he endeavoured, by his Emittances, to stir up in Normandy a general Revolt, which might give him opportunity of becoming at once Master of the whole Province. He caused it to be intimated to the Normans, that seeing they could hope for no Assistance from England, it would be better for them to return freely to the Crown of France, from whence they were wretched, than be compelled to it by Arms: That by a voluntary Submission, they would be free to preserve their ancient Privileges, whereas a Resistance, which could not but prove ineffectual, would infallibly deprive them of their Liberties. In however deep a Lethargy King John seemed to be buried, his Presence kept several of the principal Cities of Normandy in Obedience. But the Moment they saw him about to depart for England, they thought it lawful to provide for their Safety. Hardly was he embarked (4), before they concluded a Treaty with Philip, obliging themselves to own him for their Sovereign, provided they were not relieved in a Year. But when they heard there were no Preparations making in England, most of them came in before the Year was expired. Thus, of all Normandy, the City of Rouen only continued obedient to the King of England.

That unhappy Prince was far from any Thoughts of giving the Normans the Assistance they expected. Upon his Arrival in England, instead of trying by all sorts of ways to gain his People's Affection, so necessary at that Juncture, he charged his Barons with deserting him, and occasioning the loss of Normandy. Under this pretence, the most unreasonable that ever was, he extorted from his Barons the seventh Part of their Moveables, and though he had not the same cause of Complaint against the Clergy, made them liable to the same Imposition. Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, was himself his Instrument in oppressing the Clergy, whilst the Judiciary rigorously exacted the Money from the Laicks. All England beheld with Astonishment the King's Indolence. They could not conceive that a Prince, who till then had not wanted Courage, and appeared exceedingly attached to his Interest, could see Normandy lost with so much Indifference. So strange a conduct made most of the English imagine, he had some great design in his Head, which would be discovered at a proper Season. This notion did not a little contribute to his obtaining of the Parliament (5), an Aid of two Marks and a half of every Knight's Fee, which was granted in expectation the Money would be actually employed in the recovery of what he had lately lost. But instead of using this Aid, according to the Intention of the Parliament, he laid it out in vain Expences, being satisfied with sending Ambassadors to France, to endeavour to procure a Peace. Philip, exalted with his good Success, was so far from lessening his Demands, that he further required the Princess Eleanor, Sister of the late Duke of Burgundy, for his second Son, with all the Territories the English enjoyed in France for her Dowry. This demand could not but be rejected. John not only could never resolve to give his Niece such a Dowry, but it would have been very dangerous to deliver Philip, a Prince, who since the Death of the Duke her Brother, had the same Claim as he to the Crown of England. Thus the Negotiation broke off, and the English reaped no Benefit from the Aid granted the King.

Scarcely after the Departure of the English Ambassadors,

Philip sent one into England as his Champion, who challenged all that should maintain the King his Male, was in the wrong, for what he had done against John. The Court of England did not think fit to examine into the Decision of a single Combat, their Right to complain at the King of France's Proceedings. However, this vaunted Champion was given to understand, that since he was so desirous of fighting, a Match should be found with whom he might try his Strength. There was then confined in the Tower an Irish Lord, John Guesey by Name, a Earl of Ulster, a Person of a gigantic Stature, and of a violent Impetuosity, who was judged very proper to quell the French Hector. The Prisoner being brought to Court, the King asked him, whether he would fight in his Country? No, not in thine, answered the Earl haughtily, but in the Kingdom's Right I will fight in the left drop of my Blood. But whilst he was recovering his Strength, which was much impaired by a long Imprisonment, the French Champion hearing of the prodigious Strength of his Adversary, privately withdrew into Spain, not daring to appear any more either in France or England. It is related of this same Earl of Ulster, that afterwards being in France in the English Army, Philip, at a Conference with John, demanded to see some Trial of his Strength. The Earl being come into the Presence of the two Kings, ordered a large Stake to be fixed in the Ground, on which was placed a Helmet. Then looking round with a menacing Aspect, he cut the Helmet in two Pieces with his Sword. The Blow was so violent, that the Sword stuck so fast in the Stake, that none but himself could remove it. Philip asking him, why he looked round so fiercely, he made answer, that in case he had mislaid his Blow, he would have cut off the Heads of all the Spectators, that no Man living might be witness of his Shame.

What Philip could not compass by a single Champion, Philip was assisted by the help of many. Towards the end of Autumn, he laid Siege to Rouen, the Citizens whereof seeing no likelihood of being relieved, surrendered upon condition they should enjoy their ancient Privileges. But as a famous Historian judiciously observes, This Privilege proved as false against absolute Power, as Power against Liberty. As soon as Philip was master of Rouen, he ordered the Walls to be demolished. Thus all Normandy was reduced under the Dominion of France, and united again to that Monarchy after a three hundred years Separation (7).

After the Conquest of Normandy, Philip invaded the rest of the English Provinces (8), which at length were forced to submit to the Conqueror (9), after having in vain expected Assistance from England. Of all that John's Ancestors enjoyed in France, nothing remained but the Duchy of Guiney, which Philip did not think fit to invade.

Queen Eleanor, Widow of Henry II. and Mother of John, died this Year in a very advanced Age. She had the Mortification, before her Death, to behold the Decline of the Monarchy, to which She had given so great a Lustre by the addition of so many Provinces.

So many and great Losses, joined to the Murmurs of the English, roused John from his profound Lethargy. When last expelled, he seemed resolved strenuously to endeavour to regain both his Reputation and the Territories conquered by Philip. The Poitevins, distressed with being under the Dominion of the King of France, determining to revolt, sent to John for Assistance. As he imagined, all the other Provinces were in the same Mind, he thought he could never have a fairer Opportunity. Wherefore he summoned all the Barons to meet him with their Troops at Poitou, where he had ordered his Fleet to be ready. But as he was going to embark, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Earl of Pembroke threw themselves at his Feet, beseeching him to desist from this Expedition, which he could not expect to be successful. They represented to him, that neither in Poitou, nor in any other neighbouring Province, had he any one Place to retire to in case of Necessity: That Philip would make War with too much Advantage, since he was master of all the fortified Towns: That it was exposing himself to manifest Danger to trust the Poitevins, who had so often deceived him, and pretended perhaps to invite him to their Assistance only to deliver him to his Enemy. In fine, they told him, that in an Enterprize of this Nature, he 1205. so visibly hazarded his own Life, with his and the Nation's Honour, that his faithful Subjects could not see it with Indifference, but must use their utmost Endeavours to divert him from it. These Remonstrances making no Impression upon him, they talked in a higher Strain, and added such threats that he was forced at last to follow their Advice. Therefore, suddenly altering his Resolution, he was content with sending Succours to the Poitevins, under the command of the Earl of Salisbury, his natural Brother. After which, he dismissed the Army and Fleet, who cursed the Authors of this Advice (1). He was no sooner returned to London, but he repented of following the Counsel of the Earl and Archbishop. But instead of quarrelling with them, he vented his Anger on the Nobility, from whom he extorted large Sums on pretence they had refused to attend him. He supposed, without any Grounds, that the Earl of Pembroke and the Archbishop of Canterbury spoke for the whole Body. This was the second time he had arbitrarily exacted Money from his Subjects, without the Consent of the States. But he did not do it with Impunity. The Sequel will show, that though Vengeance was deferred, it only became the more terrible, when the Barons found an Opportunity to make him feel the Effects (2).

Hitherto we have seen the first part of John's Misfortunes, occasioned as well by his own Faults, as by the Ambition of the King of France. But these, how great soever, were scarce to be compared with those that followed; especially, as he appeared but little sensible of the first, whereas the others created him infinite Vexation and Trouble. It was not the Ambition of a hostile King, which threw him into a Gulph of Misfortunes, during the second part of his Reign, but the Pride of him who called himself the Common Father of all Christians. I mean Pope Innocent III. who, for a very slight Cause, treated this Prince so cruelly that should a Pope now behave in the like manner, there is no question but all Christendom would rise up against him. Let us proceed to the particulars of this Affair, which makes the chief subject of King John's Reign. But without dwelling on Reflections, which every Reader may easily make without our Help, let us content our selves with relating the Facts as advanced by the Historians, most devoted to the Court of Rome.

John scarce began to forget the Loss of the French Provinces, when the Death of the Archbishop of Canterbury (3) threw him into fresh Troubles. The Election of the Archbishop had for some time been a continual Subject of Disputes between the Suffragan Bishops and the Monks of St. Augustin's. The former claimed a Right to interpose in the Election, as had been several times practised. The Monks affirmed, on the contrary, that this Right belonged only to them, according to ancient Custom, and used their utmost Endeavours to keep Possession. Immediately after the Death of Hubert, some of the Monks, combining together, whether out of fear the Fraternity would not insist on their Right, or for some other Reason, resolved to elect themselves an Archbishop. To that purpose, meeting at Midnight in the Cathedral, they chose Reginald their Sub-Prior, in expectation of having afterwards Great enough to obtain the Pope's Confirmation. This irregular Election was transacted with all possible Secrecy. The Sub-Prior bound himself [by Oath] not to divulge it, till he had himself informed the Pope of it: So that the other Monks had not the least suspicion thereof. The Electors, willing to bring their Undertaking to an Issue, found means to cause him to be sent to Rome, on some pretence, attended by some of their Cabal. But he had not the Power to keep the Secret. Upon his Arrival in London, he took upon him the Title of Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Monks his Companions had no more Discretion than himself.

This News coming to the King's Ears, he imagined the whole Monastery was concerned in this Fraud, and prepared to make the Monks repent of their Rashness in electing an Archbishop without his Licence. But they cleared themselves, and appeased him by their Submissions. The Champions of the Monks, who were not in the Intrigue, convincing the Electors, that after the Discovery of their Secret, it would be very difficult to accomplish their Undertaking, they chose to desert. Then the whole Society jointly proceeding to a new Election, the King recommended [John de Gray] Bishop of Norwich, who was unanimously chosen, placed in the Archbishopric of Canterbury, and invested with the Temporalities. Sixteen Monks were sent to the Pope, to inform him of what had passed, and to demand his Confirmation of the new Archbishop. At the same time, the Suffragan Bishops of Canterbury sent a Deputation also to Rome, to complain of the Monks assuming the sole Right of electing the Archbishop, and to inform his Holiness of their Reasons against it.

Whilst the Deputies were on the road, the King, John, whose Courage was somewhat roused, led a considerable Army into Wiltshire, and reduced to his Obedience the greatest part of that Province. But he was so much engaged, that he suffered himself to be once more outwitted by Philip, who, finding himself unprepared, demanded and obtained a Truce for two Years (5).

Mean while, the Sub-Prior of St. Augustin's, who was come to Rome, earnestly solicited the Pope to confirm his Election. But Innocent, perceiving the Minority in the Affair, took time to consider of it. In the meantime, the other Deputies being arrived, took him in the Circumstances, and persuaded him to confirm the Election. On the other hand, the Agents of the Monks brought also their Complaints against the Pope, and showed him the Reasons on which they built their Pretensions. To decide these Differences, the Pope called the Deputies to come on a certain day to Rome, where he intended to pass some time. But when they were in the presence of the Pope, their mutual rage increased with great warmth, and as to the merits of the Cause, of both sides were not very effectual. John, who was already resolved, called both the Electors, and ordered the Deputies of the Monks to proceed to a revocation, enjoying them withal to elect Cardinal Stephen Langton, an Englishman, then at his Court. The Monks, surprised at this unprecedented Order (6), would at first have disobeyed it. They alleged in vindication of their non-compliance that they were not imposed by their Monastery, and besides the King's Consent was necessary. But the Pope would not hearken to these Reasons. He told them, as Deputies they represented the whole Monastery, and the Consent of Princes was needless for Elections made in his presence. Therefore, without giving them time to reply, he commanded them on pain of Excommunication, to elect Cardinal Langton for their Archbishop. The Monks, awed by the Presence and Threatenings of the Pope, complied, though unwillingly, with his Orders (7). There was but one (8), who had the Courage to stand out. This extraordinary Election was immediately confirmed by the Pope, who would himself consecrate the Archbishop elect (9).

According to the Rule established by Innocent, in empowering fourteen Monks deputed by their Monastery, to elect an Archbishop, the Suffragan Bishops of Canterbury could not but lose their Cause with the Monks. Accordingly, the Pope gave it in favour of these last, and forbid the Bishops to interpose for the future, in the Election of their Metropolitans.

Whilst these things were transacting in Italy, John entirely lost the Hearts of his Subjects, (10) by extorting from them the thirteenth part of their Moveables. In vain did the Clergy as far as it concerned them, oppose the Tax imposed in Parliament (11), and the Tax was laid upon the Clergy as Laity, though the former never gave their Consent, and the latter granted it by a sort of compulsion. This violence occasioned many Complaints and Murmurs amongst the Clergy, who till then had enjoyed the Privilege of not being taxed without their Consent (12). However, as it was not in their Power to resist, they endeavour'd to be revenged by exclaiming against the King's Conduct, and rendering him odious to the People. The Archbishop of York himself, the King's natural Brother, a Prelate of an impatient Temper, excommunicated the Collectors of the Tax, and withdrew out of the Kingdom. Though the Clergy's Complaints were not altogether useless, the King's Friends look'd upon them as importunate. They said, it was strange the Ecclesiastics should refuse to assist the King in his Necessity; when a little before they had suffer'd without the least Murmur, a Levate to exact of all this Beneficial Clergy large Sums for the p.c.

tended occasions of the Holy See. If the Money which accrued to the King from this Tax, had been employed in the Service of the State, it would have been some Satisfaction to the Nation. But they had the vexation to see it daily squandered away, in the reception of the Emperor, who was come to visit the King his Uncle. His Design was to perfwade him to break the Truce with France. But how urgent cover he might be, it was impossible to bring John to this rupture. However, to soften in some measure his Denial, the King made him a Present of five thousand Marks, which serv'd to pay the Charges of his Journey.

tries to appease John about the
Langton.*

Innocent very much suspected, John would not be pleas'd with Langton's Election, extorted by manifest Force, and an unprecedented Incroachment. Indeed, for some time after the conversion of the English, the Popes chose such as were capable of well-governing the Rising Church, and generally Italians, because there were but few Ecclesiasticks in England qualified for that high Station. But ever since Archbishop Theodorus, who was the last sent from Rome, the Popes had never pretended to chuse of their accord the Archbishops without the Consent of the Kings. They were satisfisd with confirming the Elections, and obliging the Archbishops to come and demand the Pall at Rome. Since the Conquest, they had not so much as null'd the Election of an Archbishop. And therefore to mollify the King, and induce him the more calmly to overlook this Incroachment. Innocent wrote him the following Letter, which for its singularity deserves to be inserted.

TO JOHN King of ENGLAND.

Pop.'s Letter 66
to the King.
Aft. Pub.
T. l. p. 139.
M. Paris. 6
p. 223. 6

A MONG the Riches that Mortals prize as the most valuable, and desire with the greatest earnestness, it is our Opinion that pure Gold and precious Stones hold the first rank. Though we are perwaded your Royal Excellence has no want of such Things, we have thought proper to send you, as a mark of our Good-will, four Rings set with Stones. We beg their favour you would confider the Mysterie contained in their Form, their Matter, their Number, and their Colour, rather than their Value. Their Roundness denotes Eternity, which having neither Beginning nor End, ought to induce you to tend without ceasing from Earthly things to Heavenly, and from things temporal to things eternal. The Number Four, which is a Square, signifies Firmness of Mind, not to be shaken by Adversity, nor elevated by Prosperity, but always continuing in the same State. This is a Perfection to which Yours will not fail to arrive, when it shall be adorned with the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Fortitude, Prudence and Temperance. The First will be of Service to you in Judgments, the Second in Adversity, the Third in dubious Cases, the Fourth in Prosperity. By the Gold is signified Wisdom. For as Gold is the most precious of Metals, Wisdom is of all Endowments the most excellent, as the Prophet witnesses in these Words, The Spirit of Wisdom shall rest upon him: And indeed, there is nothing more requisite in a Sovereign. Accordingly, Salomon, that pacific King, only asked of God Wisdom, to enable him to well govern his People. The blue colour of the Emerald denotes Faith, the clearness of the Saphir, Hope; the Redness of the Ruby, Charity; and the colour of the Topaz, Good Works; concerning which our Saviour said, Let your Light so shine before Men, that they may see your Good Works. In the Emerald therefore you have, what you are to believe, in the Saphir what you are to hope, in the Ruby what you are to love, and in the Topaz what you are to practice; to the end you may proceed from Virtue to Virtue, till you come to the Vision of the God of Gods in Heaven.

It is difficult to guess the Drift of this mysterious Letter. Whether it was a witty Conceit of the Pope's, or an Intimation to the King, that he would need all the Virtues represented by the Kings, to withstand his Attacks. However this be, least John should mistake his Message, he sent him soon after, a more intelligible Brief (1), exacting him to own Cardinal Langton for Archbishop of Canterbury. He represented to him that he was a Native of England, Cardinal of the Roman Church, and learned in all the Sciences. Moreover, he assured him, his exemplary Life and Christian Virtues would be very advantageous to England, for Spiritual, as his Prudence and Political Virtues would be for Temporal, Concerns. However, as he did not intend to make Langton's Election depend on the good Pleasure of the King, nor submit it to his Examination; in another Letter he sent his Commands to the Monks of St. Augustin's and the Suffragan Bishops of Canterbury, to receive the Cardinal for their Metropolitan.

As soon as John was informed of the Transactions at Rome, he fell into an inconceivable Fury. He acc'd the Monks of St. Auguſtin's of deceiving him, as well in the third, as in the first Election, and resolv'd to be reveng'd of them. To that end he sent two Knights (2), who entering the Monastery with drawn Swords, commanded the Monks, in the King's Name, to avoid the Place forthwith: unless they would have their Monastery burnt about their Ears, and likewise to depart the Kingdom within three Days. So terrible a Threat frightned the Monks in such a manner, that, without the least Reply, they withdrew into Flanders to the Abby of Bertin, and other neighbouring Monasteries. But this Revenge not procuring him all the Satisfaction he required, he thought by violence exerting himself, he should bring the Pope to revoke what was done. In this Belief he wrote Innocent a very sharp Letter, "upbraiding him with his injurious annulling the Canonical Election of the Bishop of Norwich, without having the least pretence for it. Moreover, he complained of his causing to be elected by violence, and contrary to all manner of right, a Person educated in France, an entire Stranger to him, and who had always held a strict Correspondence with his Enemies. He added, this Inroad was directly contrary to the Privileges of his Crown, from which he was resolv'd never to depart, nor from the Election of the Bishop of Norwich. Then, he plainly told him, if the Satisfaction he demanded was denied, he would break off all Intercourse with Rome, which was of no small Consequence, since it was certain, the Holy See received more Money from England than from any other Christian State; and for that Reason, greater Respect ought to be paid the King of England than any Prince whatever. He concluded with saying there were Prelates enough in the Kingdom qualified to govern the Church, and therefore it was not necessary to have recourse to the Popes, if they so manifestly abus'd their Authority."

Innocent has not undertaken this Affair to defile from it on the King's bare Expofition. He returned a very civil and mild Answer in appearance, though, in the main, it was more proper to irritate than appease him. He begins with blaming John for answering his humble and kind Letter in so rough a manner, that he seemed rather to defign to affront him, than require the Reasons of his Conduct. Then he proceeds to extol the Merits of Cardinal Langton, adding, he was a Prelate of a great Understanding, and profound Learning, and one that had long studied at the University of Paris, where he had taken his Degree of Doctor of Divinity. He adds, that John was in the wrong to complain, since the Consent of Princes was not requisite at Elections made in the Presence of the Pope: That however, out of pure Condescension, he had sent two Monks to inform him of it, who by contrary Winds were detained at Boulogne. In fine, after trying to prove Langton's Election agreeable to the Canons, he represents to him that Henry II. his Father, and Richard his Brother, had renounced the Right of nominating Bishops and Abbots; and therefore, without meddling with Elections, he ought to receive, without Exam-

1207. "nation, the Prelates judged by the Church capable of directing the Spiritual Affairs of his Kingdom. He concludes with this notable Threat, that Submission to him would be more for his Advantage than an obstinate Resistance against God and his Church, in a Cause, for which the Blissful Thomas Becket shed his Blood." These last Words were terrible to a Prince, whose Father had suffered so greatly on much the same Occasion. But John, far from being frightened, resolved, on the contrary, to use his utmost Endeavours, and run all hazards, to free himself from the galling Yoke of Rome.

1208. The Pope's Letter was quickly followed by an Order to the Bishops of London, Ely and Worcester, to persuade the King to submit to the Orders of the Church, and, if they found him contumacious, to put the Kingdom under an Interdict. The Bishops thus commissioned by the Pope, being obliged to obey him, acquainted the King with his Holiness's Orders, and entreated him to avoid by Submission, a Scandal which would fall no less on his Subjects than on himself. But the King remained inflexible. He swore (1), that if the Kingdom was interdicted, he would forthwith send all the Ecclesiastics to seek their Substance at Rome, and put out the Eyes, and cut off the Ears and Noses of all the Roman Priests, that should be found in his Dominions. Then he commanded the three Prelates to depart his Presence. His Passion, which was already very violent, was still encreased by the Infidelity of Simon Langton, Brother of the Cardinal, who insultingly pressed him to own his Brother for Archbishop. The King, tired with his Importunities, told him it was very strange, an Englishman should press him to renounce the Privileges of the Crown. To which Langton insolently replied, nothing could be done in his behalf, unless he would wholly throw himself upon his Brother's Mercy.

The last Year, John had a Son by Isabella of Angoulême, to whom he gave the Name of Henry (2). And this Year (3) the Queen brought into the World another, called Richard. Mean time, the three Prelates, who had already addressed the King, finding they could not prevail, pronounced at length the Sentence of Interdict upon the whole Kingdom (4), and retired beyond Sea. Immediately Divine Service ceased in all the Churches, and the Sacraments were no longer administered, except to Infants and dying Persons. Publick Prayers, and all Ecclesiastical Functions were laid aside. The Church-yards were shut up, and the Bodies of the Dead thrown into Ditches like Dogs, without any Priest daring or being willing to assist at the Funerals. It might justly be demanded, why the People should suffer for the Fault of their Sovereign; and certainly it would be difficult to alledge a Reason founded on Justice or Equity. But the Policy of Rome required, that the Subjects should be liable to Punishment, to the end that considering their King as the sole Cause of their Evils, they might be the sooner inclined to force him to submit to the Pope's Yoke. It was requisite therefore to sow Disaffection between the King and the People, in order to tie up his Hands from resisting. And indeed, it is evident, Kings have no more Power than private Persons, when defected by their Subjects. Accordingly the Popes, who intended to stretch their Authority, have generally taken a time of Discord between the People and their Sovereigns. If sometimes they have launched out at unseasonable Junctures, they have for the most Part found their pretended Authority to be little regarded. Of this we shall see a remarkable Instance in the Sequel of this very Reign.

The Pope's Rigour was insufficient to bring the King to a Compliance. On the contrary, John, finding the Court of Rome had thrown off all Regard for him, resolved to act with the same Haughtiness, and make the Pope know he was able to withstand him. Pursuant to this Resolution, he confiscated the Estates of all the Ecclesiastics who obeyed the Interdict, and sent Orders to the Sheriffs to make Inquiry after them, and expel them the Kingdom. But the Sheriffs perceiving they could not execute the King's Orders, without using great Violence, durst not push Matters so far. So that, notwithstanding the King's Intention, none went out of the Kingdom but such as having too zealously espoused the Pope's Quarrel, chose rather to go into voluntary Banishment, than remain exposed to the King's Indignation. However, they who stayed, were in no better Circumstances: Outrages were daily committed upon them, for which they could find no Redress from the Magistrates, who always sent them to the Pope for Justice.

As in those Days there was scarce a Priest but what kept a Concubine, the King, under pretence of cauling the Canons of the Councils to be observed, ordered all their Concubines to be imprisoned, who were forced to pay great Fines for their Liberty. Among the great Number of Ecclesiastics in the Kingdom, there were some, who in spite of the Interdict, administered the Sacraments. But as they were incessantly exposed to the Inflicts of the Zealots, the King took them under his Protection, and ordered such as should do them any Outrage, to be hanged upon the next Tree. The Pope was no sooner informed of this, but he excommunicated all who disobeyed the Interdict, or executed the King's Orders. Such was the wretched State of the People of England. Those that were faithful to their Sovereign fell under the Pope's Censures, and the King took care to persecute those who submitted to the Orders of Rome.

Whilst the Kingdom was in this sad Situation, Henry Brother of Otha the Emperor came to King John, in the beginning of the Year 1209. The Design of his Journey was, to demand, for the Emperor his Brother, an Aid of Money, which the King liberally granted him, though he was himself in extreme want.

The Calamities of the English moved neither the King John nor the Pope. They both continued inflexible, each resolving to run all hazards, rather than yield to his Adversary. However, John was not without his Uneasiness. Indeed, he did not fear the Pope's Spiritual Thunders with respect to Spirituals. But he could not see without extreme Trouble, the generality of the People inclined to the Court of Rome. This observation inspiring him with a dread that, sooner or later, some Plot would be formed against him, he thought it proper to prevent the Designs of his Enemies, by raising an Army. For a pretence, he complained that the King of Scotland, contrary to the Treaty of Lincoln, had married one of his Daughters, without his Consent. It was easy to foresee that a Prince, who had suffered so many Provinces in France to be taken, without any Resistance, did not intend vigorously to prosecute this War, upon so slight an Occasion. Accordingly he contented himself with the first offers made him by the King of Scotland, to give him fifteen thousand Marks (5), and his two Daughters in Hoſtage. In his return from the Northern Frontiers, where he had led his Army, he ordered all the Hedges to be cut down, and the Ditches to be filled up throughout his Forests, that the Deer might have Liberty to feed every where. In all likelihood, the People of those Parts having too openly declared for the Pope, he had a mind to punish them for it (6). Perhaps too, he designed to shew the rest of his Subjects, that in like Case he would not want means to chastise them. When he came to Northampton (7), he was met by the Prince of Wales, who, fearing he intended to carry the War into his Country, made haste to prevent him by his Submission. This Prince accompanied the King as far as Woodstock, where he did him Homage (8).

The Continuation of the Interdict was a clear Evidence to the King, that the Pope had no design to desist from his Pretensions, but would, upon this Means not succeeding, use more violent Methods. Wherefore, he judged it requisite to take care before-hand to screen himself from his Thunders. Nothing seemed to him more proper to frustrate the designs of the Court of Rome (9), than to cause his Vassals to renew their Homage. He hoped to secure them by that Bond, and restrain them from too readily joining with the Court of Rome.

Mean while, the Pope perceiving, the Interdict, which had now continued above a Year, did not answer his Expectations, resolved at length to pronounce upon John the Sentence of Excommunication, and committed the Publication thereof to certain Bishops (10). But as these 1109. Prelate had fullment regard for the King, they did not think fit to execute than Orders with that readiness the Pope desired. However, the News of the King's Excommunication was so spread over the Kingdom, that not a Soul was ignorant of it, though the Sentence was not yet published. The Archdeacon of Norwich, one of the Officers of the Exchequer, having notice of it, quitted his Office without leave, alledging his Conscience would not suffer him to serve an excommunicated Prince. This Proceeding cost him dear. The King, provoked at his disobedience, ordered him to be confined in a close Prison (1), where it is affirmed his Death was hastened by violent Means (2).

1110. This Instance of the King's Severity was not capable of preventing Hubert de Wells, lately elected Bishop of Lincoln, from wounding the King in a more sensible part. This Prelate having obtained leave to be consecrated by the Archbishop of Reims, instead of going to Normandy, went directly to Rome (3), where he received Consecration at the hands of Cardinal Langton. Had he been in the King's Power, he would, doubtless, have been no more spared than the Archdeacon of Norwich. But, the King, being all he could be, was content with seizing his Revenues (4). The Prelate was unconcerned, plainly foreseeing that the King would be obliged in the end to submit to the Pope; whereas by disobeying his Holiness, he was in danger of losing his Bishoprick (5).

The Excommunication made no Impression on the King, who still remained unmoved. Besides, as the Sentence was not yet published, and Ignorance might be pleaded, the greater Part of the Nobility still adhered to their Prince (6), notwithstanding his being excommunicated. Nay, he was not without hopes, that the Sentence was only a penal Threatening which might be revoked, upon his paying some satisfaction. However, as it would have been imprudent to depend upon that, he levied a great Army, well knowing, nothing was more capable of breaking the Pope's Measures, than to be always well armed. Some Commissions in Ireland were made the occasion and pretence for this Armament, the Charges whereof were paid by the Jews, not voluntarily, but by a seizure of their Effects (7). John himself embarked with his Army (8), safely arrived at Dublin, where he was met by about thirty (9) petty Princes, who came to swear Fealty to him. After receiving their Homage, he marched against the King of Connaught, Author of the Disturbances that had brought him into Ireland. This Prince being taken Prisoner in a Battle, the War was happily ended, and the whole Island reduced to the King's Obedience as formally. Before he returned, John caused the Laws and Customs of England to be established for the future in Ireland, and made the Bishop of Norwich his Justiciary (10). It was expected in England, that at his Return the Army would be disbanded. But, to have a pretence to keep it still on foot, he quarrelled with the Prince of Wales. In the mean time, as Money was wanted for the maintenance of the Troops, he imposed, by his own Authority, a Tax of a hundred thousand Marks (11) upon the Estates of the Ecclesiasticks. After which he marched against the Welsh, and compelled them to deliver twenty eight Hostages (12).

1111. The Measures taken by John to render himself formidable, excited no small Uneasiness in the Pope, who could not bear to see the King's Inflexibility. He perceived, it was equally dangerous to the Holy See to give over the Contests, and to prosecute it any farther, uncertain of the Issue. And indeed, it might be of great Consequence, even with respect to other States. Before he came to any Resolution in this Matter, Innocent sent two Nuntios into England (13), under colour of procuring Peace between the King and his Clergy. However, nothing was farther from his Intention, than to endeavour a Reconciliation, which could not but be very prejudicial to him. His sole Aim was to discover John's Designs, that he might take his Measures accordingly. The two Nuntios being arrived, so wrought on the King, that at length he yielded so far, as to promise the Ecclesiasticks leave to return to their Churches. He further agreed that Cardinal Langton should take possession of the See of Canterbury, and promised, that the Church of England should have all the Liberties, Privileges and Immunities enjoyed in the time of Edward the Confessor. One would think to considerable Advances should have satisfied the Nuntios. And indeed, the King gave up the main Point, in offering to receive Cardinal Langton as Archbishop. Besides, they should have previously perceived, that in an Accommodation, it was reasonable, the Pope and Clergy should likewise make some Concessions on their Part. But this Rule takes not place in Affairs where the Church is concerned. What she calls an Accommodation, is an entire Submission to her Orders, and a perfect Compliance with all her Demands. We have seen a remarkable Instance of this in the Affair of Thomas Becket: And here is another which confirms the same Truth, besides those that will appear in the course of this History. Had John thrown more Resolution, or at least, staid till the Nuntios's had, of themselves, made these Proposals, and then seemed to accept them with reluctance, perhaps there might possibly have been a Reconciliation upon these Terms. But he had to deal with Persons more subtle than himself, and whose sole Aim was to discover his Sentiments, in order to take Advantage of them against himself. When they saw he complied so far, they demanded further the Restitution of all that was taken from the Ecclesiasticks, and full Reparation for the Damages sustained by them on occasion of this Controversy. And because he would not agree to this, which in effect was impossible, the Negotiation broke off, and the Nuntios returned (14), after publishing the King's Excommunication (15), which the Bishops till then declined (16).

The Pope saw by John's Advances, that he really wanted to be clear of this Affair at any rate. He manifestly knew, it was only through Inability that he had rejected the last Article proposed him. As this Pope was very politic, and had great Views, he formed the Project of reaping Advantages, before unthought of, from this same Inability. But as the discovery of his Intentions might greatly obstruct their Execution, he carefully concealed them, till he had forced the disobedient King to cast himself upon his Mercy. Though he had nothing less in view than the Clergy of England's Reparation, he continued always to insist on that Article, in order to have occasion to carry Things to the point he desired. He knew John was not beloved by the People, and fill less by the Nobility, who had great cause to complain of him, and were kept in Obedience only by their Oath of Fealty. He believed therefore, that, to alienate entirely the Hearts of the English, it was necessary to break that Bond by which they still were attached to their Sovereign. For that purpose, taking occasion from the King's Inability, which he was pleased to stile Rebellion and Obstinacy, he published a Bull, absolving John's Subjects from their Oath, and enjoining them, upon Pain of Excommunication, to refuse him all Obedience. This terrible Blow had so great an Effect, that most of the Barons, overjoyed at having an opportunity to be revenged of the King, began to combine together to place another on the Throne. Some Historians even assure us, the Majority signed an Address to the King of France, inviting him to England, and promising to own him for their Sovereign.

Mean time, John, who had no Intelligence of their Designs, lived in a Security that astonished all the World. Far from foreseeing the impending danger, he spent his time in Entertainments and Diversions, as if he had no Affairs upon his hands, and the Pope's Bull was of no Consequence. At the same time the Welsh, who could never long remain quiet, making IncurSIONS into the English Territories, John fell into so great a Rage, that he commanded the twenty eight Hostages, he had in his Power, 1212. to be hanged. After which, as if he had nothing else to do, he resolved to carry War into their Country and utterly root them out.

Whilst he was preparing for this Expedition, the King of Scotland sent him notice of a dangerous Conspiracy forming against him in England. But John imagined, none would dare stir, whilst he was at the Head of the Army. So without giving the least heed to this Information, he continued his March to Chopier, with design to begin the War with the Widow. Upon his Arrival at that City, he received fresh Intelligence about the Conspiracy, which was confirmed from so many different Places, that he could no longer doubt. Then it was that his Security giving place to his Fears, he began to consider the Officers of his Army as so many secret Enemies whom he could not trust. Possessed with this Notion, he dismissed his Troops (1) and retired to London, where he thought himself more safe. Some time after, his Fears being somewhat abated, by certain Advice, that the Barons were in no readiness to execute their Designs, he demanded hostages of them as Pledges of their Obedience. There were but few that ventured to deny him (2), for fear of being sacrificed to his Suspensions, before they were in a State of Defence. Indeed, their Measures were yet very uncertain. If it be true, that they had applied to the King of France, that Monarch had not yet given them any positive Promise. In all appearance, he had a mind to stay till Matters were more embroiled, before he openly declared his Intention (3).

In this place it is, that Matthew Paris the Historian takes occasion to display the tyrannical Conduct of John in very black Colours. He says, that he had no manner of regard for the English; debauched the Wives and Daughters of the Prime Nobility; banished some the Realm, upon bare Suspensions, and reduced others, who were the most favorably treated, to extreme Poverty by the Confiscation of their Estates, and other illegal Practices. But the same Remark is to be made here, that was made elsewhere; Namely, we must read with great Caution the Monkish Historians, when they relate any thing in which the Court of Rome was concerned. It is true, this Historian inveighs now and then very sharply against the Person of Innocent III. But however, it is visible, his Aim was to vindicate the Pope's extreme Rigour to King John. This he could not do more artfully than by blackening the Reputation of that Prince, in order to divert the Reader's Compassion.

Whilst John was anxiously waiting the Issue of his Enemy's Plots, he met with a Mortification, which troubled him very much, though he pretended to slight it. One Peter de Poissant a Hermit, who was famous in the Kingdom for foretelling things to come, prophesied publicly, that by Attention-Day following John should be deposed, and the Crown transferred to another. The King being informed of it, sent for the Hermit, who, in his presence, shewed to what he had said, whereupon he was ordered to Prison (4).

Mean time the Pope, who had no mind to halt in so far a way, took at Rome all necessary measures to accomplish his Project. As he was desirous, it should appear to the World, that Zeal for Justice and Religion was the sole Motive of his Actions, he took particular Care to shew he had no personal Interest in his Quarrel with the King of England. The better to hide his Design, he caused a Petition to be presented him by Cardinal Lagizon, and the rest of the proscribed Bishops, humbly intreating him to apply a Remedy to the Evils, the Church of England had so long endured. 'Tis this Petition furnishing him with a pretence to call a Confraternity, he made a Speech to the Cardinals, aggravating to the utmost of his Power, the Injuries King John had done, and daily did do to the Church. He concluded with saying, the Obstinacy of that Prince not being to be conquered by the Church's Censures, he had called them together to consider of means to make this stiff-necked Son return to his Duty. The Result of the Council was, that John being convicted of Rebellion against the Holy See, deserved to be deposed, and his Holiness should place another King over England. Pursuant to this Advice, Innocent thundered out the Sentence of Deposition against King John. After that he commissioned Philip King of France to execute the Sentence, promising for Reward, the Remission of all his Sins, together with the Crown of England to him and his Heirs for ever, when once he had dethroned the present Tyrant. A few days after, he published a Bull, exhorting all Christian Princes to promote, as far as in them lay, this Expedition, which was solely intended to revenge the Injuries done to the Catholic Church. In this Bull he took into his Protection whoever should contribute either Money or other Assistance, to subdue the Enemy of the Church, granting them the same Privileges, with those who visited the Holy Sepulchre (5).

Towards the end of this Year, Gessley Archbishop of Canterbury, natural Son of Henry II, deputed this Line. He was a Prelate of a narrow Genius, but proud, pragmatical, and exceeding passionate, one that would have done a world of mischief, had he been as able as he was willing (6).

The Commission, Philip lately received of the Pope, set him at the height of his Withes. Not content with depriving King John of great Part of his Dominions, he devoted already in his Imagination the Kingdom of England. By his Preparations it was evident, how extremely desirous he was to succeed in this undertaking. The Ships, of which his Fleet was to consist, came from all Parts to the Mouth of the Seine, whilst the Princes his Vassals, and the great Men of his Realm led their Troops to Rouen, where he had appointed the Rendezvous of his Army. Such vast Preparations could not be long concealed from King John, who for his Part used his utmost Endeavours to oppose the threatened Invasion. He summoned all the Tenants in chief to meet him at Dover with their Troops, under Pain of forfeiting their Fiefs, and being exemplarily punished in their Persons. At the same time, he issued Orders, that all the Ships belonging to his Subjects should be ready at the same Place, threatening to banish the Masters that should fail to be there on any Pretence whatever. His orders were so urgent, and his Threats had so sudden an Effect, that in a little time he assembled more Ships and Troops than he could maintain. Upon which account, he was forced to send away part of his Fleet, and to keep but sixty thousand of the most warlike Men (7), a sufficient Number to defend him from all Insults, had they heartily served him. But this Prince knew better how to make himself feared than beloved (8).

Whilst the two Monarchs were with equal Ardor preparing, the one to attack, and the other to defend; whilst the sea was covered with Ships, and both Shores over-spread with Troops, expecting every Moment to enter upon Action, the Pope gave his last Instructions to Pandolph. He was one of the two forementioned Nuncios, who, upon this occasion, was made Legate for England. His publick Instructions were to use his utmost Endeavours to prevail with King John to submit to the Church. But his private ones were, to put the last hand to the Project framed by the Pope. He passed through France, where he beheld Philip's great Armament, and commended his Zeal and Diligence; after which he went to meet the King of England at Dover. When he came into his Presence, he represented to him that his Enemy's Forces were so numerous, that they were sufficient to conquer England, though the whole Nation were united for their common Defence; but that John was very far from being able to rely on the People's Affections. And to convince him of it beyond all doubt, he discovered to him that Philip had received private Assurances, from most of the great Men of England, that, instead of opposing his Arms, they would assist him to the utmost of their Power. This Intelligence cor-

The Wives are directed to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, commanding them to furnish out the Knights, Barons, Knights, Freeman and Esquires. The Wives for the Ships were directed to all the Bayliffs of Sea-Ports, &c. See M. Paris p. 232.

1213.] responding with what John had already received, he was vividly shaken, neither could he hide from the Legate the Fears that he seized his Soul. This was precisely the situation wherein Pandaro intended to put him. As soon as he saw him thus disposed, he took occasion to intimate to him, that there was but one way to secure himself from the impending danger; and that was to put himself under the Pope's Protection, who, as a kind and merciful Father, was still willing to receive him with open Arms. But, added he, to deserve this Favour, you must become a perfect Servant to the Church; and to that end must promise to perform faithfully whatever the Pope shall enjoin you; wherein, in imitation of him, whose Representative he is on Earth, desires

his evil Ways.
 Never was Prince in such Circumstances as John. Standing between two Principles equally dangerous; and without a necessity of casting himself down one or other, without having time to consider which was most eligible. Pandolph pressed him ineffectually to embrace the Pope's gracious Offer. On the other hand, Philip, ready to embark, afforded him no time to consult what Course he should take. But what perplexed him most, was, his distrust of his Army, and his dread of a Treachery, the Consequences whereof flared him in the Face. On which Side soever he turned, he saw himself on the Point, either of falling into the hands of his most invidious Enemy, or of lying at the Mercy of a Pope, whom he had for so long braved, and who was the sole Author of his Misfortunes. Of these two Extremities the last seemed the least supportable, because he saw not the Pope's whole Design. The Legate took care, not to impart to him at first all the Conditions, required by the Pope, for his Favour and Protection. He was satisfied for the present, with obliging him by a solemn Oath, to obey the Pope in all things for which he was excommunicated (1); to make a full Satisfaction to the Clergy and Laicks for what Damages they had suffered on account of the Interdict; to pay down, in part of Restitution, the Sum of eight thousand Pounds Sterling; to receive into Favour the proscribed Bishops, and others, particularly Cardinal Langton, and the Prior and Monks of St. Augustin's (2); to confirm all these things by his Letters Patents, and cause such Bishops and Barons as the Pope or his Legate should appoint, to stand Sureties for him; to declare solemnly, if he, or any other by his order, should violate this Agreement, he would for ever lose the Custody of vacant Churches, and the Bishops and Barons his Sureties, should be authorized to serve the Pope against him. Moreover, he promised to send Letters of Safe-Conduct to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other exiled Bishops, that they might return to their respective Churches. Lastly, he swore not to prosecute any Person, whether Laysman or Ecclesiastic, for any Matter relating to the Affairs in hand (3).

in hand 3). In the State, John was reduced to, he would have thought these Conditions extorted, had there been nothing added. But the Oath, exacted from him, to obey the Pope in all things, included a tacit Condition, the extent whereof Pandolph did not think proper to tell him, before he was entirely engaged. When this Article came to be explained, the Legate plainly told him, his Offices against God and the Church were of such a nature, that there could be no Atonement without a Renunciation of his Crown to the Pope: Adding, upon that Condition only, he could give him Absolution. Such a Proposal could not but extremely surprize the unfortunate King; but he was too far engaged to recede. His late Proceeding had entirely alienated those of his Subjects, who still preserved some remains of Affection. On the other hand, he perceived, as he could not confide in his Troops, he had no other means to resist Philip's powerful Attacks. He lay therefore under an indissoluble Necessity to submit to this hard Condition, which he would have infallibly rejected, could he have known the full extent of his Oath. Wherefore, on the morrow, he repaired to Dover Church, attended by the Legate, and a numerous Train of Lords and Officers of the Army, to perform his Engagements. There, in the Presence of all the People, taking off his Crown, he laid it, with the other Ensigns of Royalty, at the Legate's Feet, as the Pope's Representative. After which, he signed a Charter, whereby he resigned to the Pope the Kingdom of England, and the Lords of Ireland. He declared in this Charter, that, because out of Fear or Constraint, but of his own free Will, and with the Advice and Consent of all the Barons of the Realm, he made this Renunciation, as having no other way to avoid his Offences against God and his Country. From that moment he acknowledged himself a Vassal of the Holy See, and, as such, bound himself to pay the yearly Rent of a thousand Marks; namely, seven hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland. In fine, he agreed that it himself, or any of his Successors, denied the Submission due to the Holy See, he should forfeit his Right to the Crown (4). After this, he did Homage to the Pope, in the Person of the Legate; who, to shew the Grandeur of his Master, spurned with his Foot the Money offered him by the King as an Earnest of his Subjection. They that were present at this shameful Ceremony, could not behold such abject Submissions without Indignation; but not one dared to speak against them: Only the Archbishop of Dublin protested against them, but to no purpose (5). The Legate, having obtained whatever he desired, kept the Crown and Scepter five whole Days; and then restored them to John, with an intimation that he was to confider it as a singular Favour from the Holy See. So extraordinary a Transaction had its natural Effect on the People. If hitherto the King had been little regarded, this base Submission rendered him entirely contemptible. From that time he was deemed unworthy to wear a Crown, which he had so shamefully resigned to another. On the other Side, Innocent's extreme Pride gave occasion for Reflections, to his Disadvantage. Though John should seem to have been very sensibly touched with what had happened, he appeared to be the first that forgot it. He even seemed to triumph in preferring his Crown in spite of the Hermite's Prediction. Tho' his Prophecy was so fully accomplished, John was so cruel as to order him to be hanged (6) for a false Prophet.

Mean time Pandolph, who had no farther Business in Parliament, England, was departed from Devon (?), without taking any thing off the Interdict, or giving the King Abolution. He was gone to Philip, who considered the Conquest of England. Parliament as a thing certain. When he came to that Monarch, he enjoined him, in the Pope's Name, to desist from the intended Expedition. He told him, the King of England being now a dutiful Son of the Church, and the occasion of the Armament ceasing, it was no longer necessary to execute the Pope's Sentence. Philip was extremely surprized at this Discourse (8). But as he had not acted in this Affair from a Religious Motive, he openly refused to obey the Legate's Orders. He told him, he had made these Preparations against England, at the Pope's pressing Influences, for the Remission of his Sins, and therefore no contrary Orders, nor all the Threats in the World, should hinder him from prosecuting his Design. Thus resolved, he called a Council of the chief Lords of the Kingdom, and of the Princes his Vassals who were then about him. As he was extremely provoked with Innocent, the Terms he used in speaking of him to the Assembly were not very respectful; and the more, as it was greatly for his Purpose, to paint out the Pope's Proceedings in the strongest and most lively Colours. His Aim was to persuade all the Lords to swear, they would not forsake him though the Pope should thunder his Censures against him. Accordingly this was the drift of his Speech.

Accordingly this was the drift of his speech. The Princes and Lords who were present at the Council, seemed inclined to comply. The Earl of Flanders alone opposed it, and in a manner very reproachful to Philip. He represented, that the intended Expedition against the King of England, was in itself neither just nor honorable, and besides was become impracticable, since the Pope refused his Approbation. He added, it would be much more agreeable to the Rules of Honour and Equity, to restore to that Prince what had been taken from him in France, than to frame new Projects to make an advantage of his Misfortunes. Philip offended at these bold Words mixed with reproaches upon his Conduct, thought it necessary before all things, to humble the Earl of Flanders. His view was to terrify the rest of his Vassals by his Example, and to deprive the King of England by his

of the Ambace he might receive from so firm a Friend. It may be, he was very glad, the Earl furnished him with an opportunity to see himself from his present Embarrassment. He could not, without Dishonour, submit to the Pope's Orders, neither could he make War upon King John, with out exposing his Person to an Excommunication, and his Kingdom to an Interdict. Be this as it will, he ordered his Fleet to sail to the Coast of Flanders, whither he marched himself with his Army to attack the Earl by Land. The Progress of his Arms was at first very considerable. Probably, the Earl of Flanders would have been ruined, if John had not sent his Naval Force to his Aid. The Earl of Salisbury, who commanded the King's Fleet, surprising that of Philip, entirely destroyed it. It is said, the English took three hundred Ships, and sunk one hundred, and that the French themselves let them to the rest, to prevent their falling into the Enemy's Hands. This fatal loss blasted all Philip's grand Projects, and obliged him to relinquish his Undertaking, and return to Paris extremely mortified.

This Victory suddenly raised the Courage of King John. As he was assured for the future of the Pope's Assistance, he resolved to carry the War into France, and try to recover his lost Dominions. He was the more encouraged to this Enterprise, as the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders promised, to make a powerful Division in his Favour. Wherefore he caused his Army to march to Portmouth, where he ordered his Fleet to meet him. But as he was ready to embark, the Barons sent him Word, they could not attend him, unless he was first absolved from his Excommunication (1). This Declaration made him dispatch a Sine-Conduct to Cardinal Langton, and the rest of the Bishops, that they might come and advise him. At the same time, he acquainted them, he was ready to perform all his Engagements, and particularly those which concerned them. Upon their Arrival at the Bishop's, he sent the King at Winchester, who, throwing himself on their Feet, besought them to have Pity on him and the Kingdom. The Cardinal lifting him up, told him the Church, where in the Presence of all the Bishops, he administered to him the following Oath: "That he would protect Holy Church to the utmost of his Power; to maintain the good Laws of his Predecessors, and especially those of King Edward; cause Justice to be ministered to his Subjects according to the just Judgment of his Court; restore to Corporations and private Persons, their Rights and Liberties; and before Easter next, make full Satisfaction for all the Damages he had caused." This done, the King renewed his Oath of Fealty and Obedience to the Pope, according to the Tenor of his late Charter to the Legate; after which, the Cardinal gave him Absolution. The King appeared to him pleased to see himself at length freed from so many Troubles, that to show the Cardinal, he bore him no secret Grudge, he made him that very Day sit at the same Table with him.

The War being thus ended, John came to Portsmouth, where he unexpectedly met with fresh Obstacles. When he talked of embarking, his Barons, who were there upon his Summons, declared they could not go with him. They told him, they had stayed so long at Portsmouth, that all their Money, designed for the Expedition, was spent, and therefore they were unable to attend him. To this, the Discontented heartily vexed him, he thought that he would be able to overcome them, and so he sent them upon the Point of Honour, took shipping himself with his own Family, and sailed for Jersey. But after waiting there some Days, and finding himself forsaken by all, he returned to England, with a resolution to classify the Disobedience of the Barons (4). Upon his Arrival, he raised some Troops, and marched towards the City of the Kingdom. His design was to have it in his power to prevent them from taking Arms, or to oppress those that should first venture to appear. The Cardinal Archbishop, perceiving his Intention, came to him at Northampton, and represented to him, that none of the Barons living being legally (5) condemned, he could not make War upon them without violating his late Oath. The King, moved at this Remonstrance, answered with a loud Voice, he had no need of his Advice, and refusing to hear him any more, continued his March as far as Nottingham. Langton, not discouraged at this refusal, followed him next Day, and declared, he would excommunicate all that should take Arms before the Relaxation of the Interdict. This Threat making the King apprehensive his Troops would desert him, he was forced to desist from his Enterprise. However he appointed a Day for the Barons to appear and answer for their Disobedience.

Langton's Proceedings were sufficient to satisfy the King, he was not heartily reconciled to him. But he had soon a more convincing Proof.

In an Assembly of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, held at London about the Reformation promised by the King, Langton took occasion to speak very warmly against him. He said, "That before he gave the King Absolution, he caused him to swear to restore the Church, the Nobility, and the Commonalty, to their Rights and Privileges (6): But it was visible he had not yet made the least Step towards the Performance of his Oath: That on the contrary, he would have made War on his Barons, before they were legally tried, which was a clear Evidence of his ill Designs. And therefore, continued he, it was absolutely necessary for the Good of the Publick, to press him to perform his Engagements. But as Difficulties might occur in the Particulars, to be required of the King, he said, a Charter might be used of one of his former Kings, of which he had fortunately found a Copy, notwithstanding the Pains taken to bury it in Oblivion." The Charter mentioned by the Cardinal, was that granted by Henry I. to his Subjects, in the beginning of his Reign (7). Authentick Copies had been sent to all the principal Monasteries, which were lost by the Negligence of those who had the Custody of them, or perhaps by the Means of Henry I. himself, or his Successors. This, which perhaps, was the only one left, falling into the Cardinal's Hands, he publicly caused it to be read before the Assembly. The Barons, who had only a confused Notion of this Charter, were very well pleased with its being found, but more so with the Contents. Therefore, without further consideration, they resolved to make it the Foundation of their Demands. Then they entered into a Confederacy, and bound themselves by Oath, to use their utmost Endeavours to obtain the Re-establishment of their ancient Privileges, and mutually stand by one another. The Cardinal promised for his Part, to do all that lay in his Power to promote their Designs. This is the first League or Confederacy made in England, in Defence of the Nation's Interests against the King.

Though the Barons intended to keep their League private, till a favorable Opportunity offered to discover their Designs, the King was soon informed of it. He foresaw the Consequence, but, as it was not in his power to break it, he believed the only way to be safe, was to put himself under the Pope's powerful Protection. Pursuant to this Resolution, he sent a trusty Messenger to his Holiness, to inform him of what passed, and entreat him to grant him his Assistance in so pressing a Necessity. His Request was attended with a very handsome Present, in order to obtain more readily what he desired (8). Langton was overjoyed at the News of the Disfellowship, like to break out between the King and the Barons. If any thing was capable of depriving him of the Sovereignty lately acquired over the Kingdom of England, it was, doubtless, a strict and hearty Union between the King and the Nobles. The Renunciation extorted from John, was of itself so repugnant to all Right, and so full of Nullities that it must have fallen to the Ground, if the King and his Subjects could have been brought to so necessary a Union. And therefore nothing being more agreeable to the Pope, than to see the King and the Barons in no way to support one another, he resolved to make their Disfellowship a Means, more firmly to establish his Authority in the Kingdom (9). To that end, without discovering his Knowledge of the Confederacy of the Barons, he sent (10) Cardinal Nicolas, Bishop of Tusculum, (now Praefecti,) as his Legate into England, with Power to relax the Interdict, and reconcile the King and the Clergy, concerning the promised Reformation. John offering a hundred thousand Marks, the Legate seemed satisfied with the Sum; but the Bishops openly rejected this Offer, chusing rather to let the Kingdom groan under the intolerable Burden of an Interdict, than recede in the least from their Pretensions. The Legate was not displeased with their Obstinacy, which gave him an occasion to acquaint the King with the Orders he had received from the Pope. He represented to him, he could never expect to live in Peace, till he had put himself entirely under the Protection of the Apostolick See: "That therefore, it was necessary to make a second Renunciation of his Crown, the first being liable to many Exceptions: That afterwards the Pope, finding himself indispensably obliged to support him, would infallibly free him from all his Troubles."

John found himself in an ill Situation; surrounded with Difficulties, and having almost as many Enemies as Lords in the Kingdom, he had no other Refuge but the Pope's Protection. Accordingly, though this Protection could not be obtained but by a second Renunciation of his Crown, he was once more perwaded to that servile Compliance. This renunciation being taken, he convened a general Assembly at Westminster, where, in the presence of all the Lords, he solemnly resigned a second time his Crown to the Pope, with all the Formalities the Legate was pleased to require. He signed also another Charter, wherein Care was taken to supply all the Defects of the former. To render it more Authentick, it was sealed with Gold, the first being sealed only with Wax. Then the King delivered it to the Legate, for the use of the Pope his Master. It was not difficult for the confederate Barons to perceive, their Secret was discovered, and that John's second Renunciation was the Price of the Pope's Protection. As nothing was more opposite to their Design, of recovering their ancient Privileges, than the Vassalage to which John had subjected the Kingdom, Cardinal Langton solemnly protested against it, and laid his Protestation upon the Altar.

Innocent having notice of Langton's Protestation, was extremely incensed, that a Cardinal should act so directly contrary to the Interests of the Holy See. He durst not however fall upon him, for fear of putting the whole Kingdom in Commotion, and inducing the English to join with Langton in Defence of their Liberties. Indeed, it was by no means proper, to let the Nation feel so soon the Weight of their new Servitude. On the contrary, it was the Court of Rome's Interest to let her Rights lie dormant a while, that the English, perceiving no Alteration, might be less inclined to shake off their late Yoke. Mean time, the Pope however took occasion to mortify the Archbishop, by empowering his Legate Cardinal Nicholas, to fill all the vacant Benefices in England. The Legate abused his Power most shamefully. Not content with conferring the Benefices on Italians, on his Relations and Creatures, he even gave some to Persons unborn. Langton, angry that his Commission should be given to another, took occasion from the Legate's ill Conduct, to appeal to the Pope against his Proceedings, and sent his Brother Simon to Rome to prosecute the Appeal. He found Innocent little inclined to give ear to Complaints against a Legate, who had just done him such signal Services. Besides, Pandulph, who was sent to Rome with the Charter sealed with Gold, had very much blasted the Credit of the Archbishop, and all the English Lords. He represented them as turbulent Persons, and extolled the King as the most pious of Princes. This Account caused Innocent, regardless of Langton's Remonstrances, to dispatch Orders to his Legate to take off the Interdict (1), which had now lasted above six Years. As for the Satisfaction demanded by the Clergy, he ordered, the King should pay but forty thousand Marks, in lieu of all the Restitution.

Thus ended this grand Affair, which rendered the King of England the Pope's Vassal and Homager. An Event of this Nature affords ample Matter for Reflections, which the Reader is left to make. I shall content myself with observing, that, if in the first Negotiation, the Pope would have been satisfied with exacting from John to moderate a Restitution, things would then have been, doubtless, adjusted. For that was the only Obstacle to a Reconciliation, since the Nuncio's were pleased with all the rest of the King's Proposals. But John had not yet resigned his Crown to the Pope, whereas after his Renunciation, the hundred thousand Marks offered by him, were reduced to forty thousand. The Clergy, who were in hopes of receiving immense Sums for this Restitution, were very much disappointed. Nevertheless, not daring to contradict the Pope's express Orders, they were forced to be satisfied with a very moderate Sum, in comparison of what they expected. The Bishops however found means to indemnify themselves, by not giving any share of the forty thousand Marks to the inferior Clergy and Monasteries. These last made their Complaints to the Legate: But could get no other Answer, save only, that having Orders from the Pope, it was not in his Power to give them any Redress.

John finding himself freed, though to his eternal Shame, from an Affair which had created him much Trouble, resolved to prosecute the Design which the Disobedience of the Barons had obliged him to give over. He hoped to meet with more Submission in his Subjects, since the Pope had openly declared himself his Protector, than whilst he lay under the Sentence of Excommunication. After making the necessary Preparation, for so important an Enterprize (2), he came to Rachel with a numerous Army, and entering Poitiers, subdued that Province with the same Ease it was taken from him. Encouraged by this good Success, he marched into Anjou, and rebuilt the Walls of Angiers which he had formerly demolished. This sudden Attack surprized Philip, who being then employed in the Low Countries in an important War with the Emperor and the Earl of Flanders, could not timely enough oppose this new Enemy. However his Son Prince Lewis, raising an Army with all possible Expedition, advanced towards Anjou, whilst the English were besieging the strong Castle of La Roche au Moine. The Approach of the French Army causing to vanish John's hopes of being able to continue the Siege, he resolved to raise it and give Lewis Battle. But the Poitevins refusing to follow him, he was not only forced to relinquish that Design, but even to retreat with some Precipitation. The French Historians say, he was briskly attacked in his Retreat, and received a great Loss. The English, on the contrary, affirm, that Lewis, satisfied with raising the Siege, retired without pursuing him. Notwithstanding this Accident, John had Troops sufficient to expect a good Issue of the War, had it continued. But the News of the Battle of Bouvines gained by Philip in Flanders, made him think of retreating. This Victory, the most considerable, France had ever obtained (3), making John apprehensive, the whole Burden of the War would lie upon him, demanded a Truce for five Years, by the Mediation of the Pope's Legate. Though a famous Historians affirm, Philip granted this Truce only at the pressing Instances of the Pope, it may be presumed he was not very unwilling to consent to it. For he could not desire any thing more advantageous than to see the English return home, since he could gain but little upon them, whereas he had a great deal to lose (4).

We are now come to the third Period of King John's Reign, which was no less full of Troubles and Misfortunes than the two former. We have seen him in the two first, struggling with two foreign Powers, who triumphed over him. In this we shall see him contending with his own Subjects, and reduced, in order to support himself in the Throne, to lay waste his own Kingdom, with an Army of divers Nations, and at length behold a foreign Prince receive the Oath of Fealty from the English.

After being expoled to so many Misfortunes, John, as he himself seemed, thought at the Expence of his Honour, to pass the Residue of his Life in Peace. But his Lot was otherwise. His past Conduct mixt with Haughtiness, Caprice, Tyranny, Imprudence, Cowardice, had bred among his Subjects a general Discontent, that could not fail of producing ill Effects. As he lost the People's Esteem, the Barons became less tractable. Their hopes of success in their Designs, were properly built on the little Affection of the People for their Sovereign. As soon as the King was returned from his French Expedition, the Barons, who had always their former Projects in view, resolved to demand in a Body the Re-establishment of their Privileges. Under colour of a Pilgrimage, the chief Earls and Bishops met at St. Edmund's-Bury, where they came to a Resolution, to demand of the King the Confirmation of the Charter of Henry I. This Charter, as was observed, contained in Substance the Liberties enjoyed by the People of England, during the Domination of the Saxon Kings. Before they parted, it was agreed, that immediately after Christmas, they would go to the King in a Body, and present him their Petition. Mean time every one went to his own home to provide himself with Men, Horses and Arms, to be in condition to compel the King, if there was occasion, to grant their Desires. But before I proceed to detail not be amiss to examine the occasion of those Quarrels 1214. Now the Foundation of the Barons Pretensions and of the King's Refusal of what they so earnestly demanded, was as follows.

It can't be denied; that in the Reigns of the first Norman Kings, and particularly under William the Conqueror, the English were oppressed. They were so unjustly dealt with, that not an Englishman was left in possession of any considerable Fee (1). The Normans and other Foreigners were decked with their Spoils. At that time the English, who had so great Cause to complain, in vain alleged their Privileges; all Ears were deaf to their Complaints. On the contrary, the Normans thought it no Injustice for the King to use a despotic Power, as long as it was for their Advantage. The Laws of Edward the Confessor were in such Disrepute, that it was almost Treason to mention them. But when once these same Normans saw themselves firmly settled in their new Acquisitions, they began to perceive how dangerous it was to live under an Arbitrary Power, which might deprive them of what the Conqueror had given their Ancestors. Therefore by degrees they put on the English Genius, wholly addicted to Liberty, and wanted to have the Saxon Laws re-established. All Distinction between the two Nations was entirely removed. Every one was desirous of being English rather than Norman. Probably this was the chief Reason why the Norman Language prevailed not in England, notwithstanding the Care and Pains of William I. to that end. Upon all fair occasions, the Normans spoke like true Englishmen, and earnestly demanded the Revival of the Laws of Edward. They particularly took Advantage of the Circumstances of William Rufus, Henry I. and Stephen, when they mounted the Throne. As these Princes had not properly any Right to the Crown, they were forced to be indulgent to their Subjects, and promise them the Re-establishment of their ancient Laws. Indeed, what the Barons demanded would have been very right in the Mouth of an Englishman; but these same Pretensions, with Respect to the Normans, might be very justly contested. Accordingly we have seen in the History of these three Princes, though they solemnly promised to revive these Laws, they never heartily set about the being as good as their Word. Nevertheless those solemn and repeated Engagements gave the Barons of Norman Race, a Right which they had not before. The Circumstances of the three first Norman Kings, when they ascended the Throne, were therefore the true Cause of these wrong Proceedings, which afterwards became so prejudicial to their Successors. They knew their Norman Subjects had no right to demand the Revival of the Saxon Laws, which must have been evidently violated, to settle them in the Estates they possessed in England. But necessity compelled these Princes to promise what they never intended to perform. The Charter of Henry I. was never executed either by himself or any of his Successors. What care soever was taken to send Copies to the principal Monasteries, it was with great difficulty that a single one was found, a hundred Years after, and shown by Cardinal Langton to the Lords. If therefore the Rights of the Barons are originally considered, they must be concluded to be built upon no good Foundation, because the principal Fiefs were in the hands of the Defendants of those, to whom they were granted by William the Conqueror. But on the other side, it must be confessed, that the many solemn Promises, of all the Kings since the Conqueror, to restore the Saxon Laws, commonly called the Laws of St. Edward, gave the English-Normans a very plausible Right to demand the Performance thereof.

From what has been said it may be easily inferred, that if the Barons thought themselves intitled to demand the Re-establishment of the Privileges of the English Nation, John believed himself no less authorised to refuse it. This Contest remaining undecided during several Reigns, both Parties had kept up their respective Pretensions. When the King was weak, or in such Circumstances as permitted him not to contend, the Barons tried to get the Liberties of the English restored, and the Prince not knowing what to do better, put them off with fair Promises, which he had no design to perform. But, under able Kings, who were in Prosperity, the Contest was stilled, and the Barons waited for a more favourable opportunity to compass their ends. They thought they had now met with one, and resolved to improve it. John's Circumstances were just as they wished. Hated and despised by the People, to whom he had given great occasions of Discontent, he could never hope to regain their Affection. On the other hand, he was without hopes of Assistance from King Philip, his most mortal Enemy. Much less could he expect any Succours from the Emperor his Nephew, or the Earl of Flanders, who were equally crushed by the Battle of Bovines. Neither was it likely, that the King of Scotland would espouse the quarrel of a Prince, with whom he was extremely displeased. As for the Assistance, John might expect from the Pope, as it was to consist only of Spiritual Arms, the Barons were in no concern about it; well knowing such Weapons have no Edge, but what Fear, and the Circumstances of Time and Place give them. But as they had reason to hope, the People would join with them, in defence of their common Interests, they were not afraid, the Pope's Thunder-bolts would do them much hurt. John therefore was necessarily forced to yield on this occasion; for having lost the French Provinces, he had no Refuge against the English.

Full of these hopes, and holding themselves sure of Success, the Barons (2) came to the King at London (3), and demanded in plain and express Terms, the Re-establishment (4) of the Laws of St. Edward, with the other Rights and Privileges contained in the Charter of Henry I. They alleged, they required only, what he himself had promised with a solemn Oath, before he received his Absolution, and for that reason, their most humble Petition could not be looked upon as an Innovation, much less as proceeding from a Spirit of Rebellion. This Petition, though expressed in the most respectful Terms, alarmed the King. As he found they had taken their Resolution, in case it was rejected, he believed his best course would be to gain time. He desired them therefore to stay for his Answer till Easter, assuring them, he would then declare his Intentions. Though it was very easy to see, the King only sought to amuse them, they were afraid of being blamed, should they refuse this delay and retire (5).

Mean time, the King taking Advantage of this delay, caused the Oath of Fealty to be renewed by all his Subjects, and Homage by all his immediate Vassals. After which, he took upon him the Crozier (6), as if he intended to go to the Holy-Land, to the end he might shelter himself under the Church's Protection (7). On the other hand, the Pope being informed of the Baron's Petition, sent them a Letter, exhorting them to continue in Obedience to their Sovereign. But that did not hinder them from prosecuting their design.

As soon as Easter was come, the great Men met at Stanford, consisting of almost all the Nobility, and making a powerful Army, in which were above two thousand Knights, besides other Horse and Foot, armed with divers Weapons (8). The King, who was at Oxford in expectation of their coming, hearing of their Number and Posture, did not think fit to expose his Person in a Conference with them. Before they advanced any nearer (9), he sent the Earl of Pembroke (10) to know, what the Laws and Liberties were, which they mentioned in their Petition. Upon which, they delivered a long Memorial of the Laws and Customs observed in the time of the Saxon Kings; declaring, if the King would not confirm them, they were resolved to compel him, by seizing his Castles.

(1) Not only Knight's Fees and part of Knight's Fees, but also Honours and Baronies (which were the greater Fees) were called Fees. And not with out Cause, for, except they were held by grand Serjeanty only, they were usually composed of Knight's Fees. In general, Fee is a Name applicable to all Benefices, Hors de Franch, Feu, Feu de la Barone, is as much as to say, cur of an Barony. It may be observed, that Feoffment signified originally the Grant of a Feud or Fee. Nevertheless, by Custom it came afterwards to signify also, a Grant (with a very and seldom) of a free inheritance, to a Man and his Heirs, respect being had rather to the Perpetuity of the Estate granted, than the Federal Tenure. And this has been called a Feoffment in Fee simple. Out of the Fee-simple there has been derived another kind of inheritable Estate, which has been called a concomitant Fee, or Fee-Tail. There are likewise Feoffments in Life. See h. ad. x. Differt. on Charters and Infrons. p. 4.

John

1215. Vassal of the Holy See, he could do nothing without his Consent. With this Letter he sent a Copy of the Charters, and desired the Pope to observe, that all the Articles were so many Inroachments upon the Regal Power, and consequently upon the Lord Paramount. This was flattering the Pope in the most sensible Part. Upon this foundation he intreated him to absolve him from his Oath, that he might, with a safe Conscience, use his Endeavours to free himself from so heavy a Yoke. After taking these measures, with all possible Secrecy, fearing, if he appeared too much in publick, his Designs might be discover'd, or guess'd at, he chose the Isle of Wight for his Residence. In this Retirement he kept himself as it were conceal'd a good while, conversing only with Fishermen and Sailors, and diverting himself by walking on the Sea-shore with his Dogs. When the King was known to be retir'd to the Isle of Wight, People were in vain inquisitive about the Cause of his Retreat. Some jok'd, and said, he was become a Fisherman or Merchant, others, that he designed to turn Pirate. But though he was not ignorant of these Scoffs, he never regarded them. During three Months, he waited patiently for the return of his Agents, and the Arrival of the foreign Troops, which he was made to expect.

He met with no difficulties at the Court of Rome, whose Interest it was to support him. Innocent fell into a strange Passion with the Barons, for daring, without consulting him, to cause their King to sign Charters of that nature, and put a constraint upon a Prince who had taken the Cross, and was under the Church's Protection. In his Rage, he swore [by St. Peter] that let what would be the Consequence, their Rashness should not go unpunished. At the same time he sent them a Letter, enjoining them to renounce what they had extorted from their Sovereign, unless they would incur the Indignation of the Holy See. But the Barons made light of his Injunctions, and without fearing his Thunders, seized upon Rechefer (1), which Cardinal Langton put into their hands (2). They found there a prodigious quantity of Ammunition, laid in by the King, to be used upon occasion. This was probably, the reason of their taking that Place.

Mean time, the Pope annulling the two Charters, and absolving the King from his Oath, John's Affairs began to have a new Face; by the Advice he received, that his Agents had lifted great Numbers of Adventurers in his Service, Whereupon, John hastily quitted the Isle of Wight, and went to receive them at Dover. In a short time, he had the Satisfaction to see vast Numbers arrive from Brabant, Flanders (3), Normandy, Poitou, Gascogne, all Soldiers of Fortune, and ready to venture their Lives to gain an Estate. The Number of these Adventurers was so considerable, that the Historians who mention it, are faine to be credited. But by an unexpected Accident, one of the Leaders, Hugh de Boves, with no less, as it is said, than forty thousand Men, perished in the Sea. If these had safely arrived, John would, doubtless, have had it in his Power to treat the Normans settled in England, in the same manner as William the Conqueror had formerly treated the English. But, notwithstanding this great Loss, there were Troops enough left to enable him to trample upon the Barons, who little expected such a Revolution. His first Undertaking, was the Siege of Rechefer, which, after a long Resistance, surrendered at last, in spite of the Barons endeavours to throw in some Succours. He was so exasperated, that he would have hanged the whole Garrison, if his Generals had not represented to him, that he would expose his own Troops to the same cruel Usage (4). After the taking of Rechefer, he divided his Army into two Bodies. He gave one to his natural Brother the Earl of Salisbury, to go and ravage the southern Counties, whilst with the other he marched into the northern Parts, to make them feel the Effects of his Vengeance. Never was England in so deplorable a Condition: She had two Armies of hungry Foreigners in her Bowels, ravaging the Country in a merciless manner. We may easily guess that they spared not the Houses and Lands of the Barons, who, perceiving themselves not strong enough to appear in the Field, were retired to London.

Mean while, the Pope thundered out an Excommunication against the Barons, and ordered Pandulph, and the Bishop of Rechefer, to enjoin Cardinal Langton in his Name to publish the Bull. But the Archbishop, pretending the Pope was imposed upon, refused to comply, till he himself had informed his Holiness of all Particulars. His true Reason was, because he could not resolve to proceed against those whom he had himself encouraged to take Arms. Upon his Refusal, the two Commissioners published the Excommunication themselves, and suspended the Archbishop, pursuant to their Orders. The Barons not valuing this Censure, on pretence they were not particularly named in the Bull, continued their Endeavours to defend themselves against the King. As for the Cardinal Archbishop, he was sent for to Rome, where he was like to be deposed, but the Pope relenting at the Intreaties of the other Cardinals, only confirmed his Suspension. Some time after, he found another occasion to mortify him, by voiding his Brother Simon's Election, who was chosen Archbishop of York, and putting his Enemy, Walter de Grey in his room; from whom however he exacted [for his Pall] ten thousand Pounds Sterling (5), for the occasions of the Holy See. In fine, after several Mortifications at Rome, Langton's Suspension was taken off, on condition, he would not return to England till the Troubles were entirely appeased.

When Innocent was informed of the Barons Pretence for not submitting to the Excommunication, he published another Bull, wherein they were all excommunicated by name. Their Lands were put under an Interdict, as well as the City of London, which had taken their part. As the Barons expected this second Bull, they were resolved not to regard it, and prevent its being published in London. They alledged in their Vindication, that, the Bull was obtained by false Suggestions, and consequently of no force; that besides, it was not the Pope's Business to meddle with Temporal Affairs, since St. Peter received from Christ only Spiritual Power; for which reason it was neither Just nor Right, that Christians should suffer themselves to be governed by the Ambition and Avarice of the Popes. One would hardly believe, they who talked at this rate, were the same Persons who refused to serve the King, because he was excommunicated; were there not a thousand Instances to show, how apt Men are to square their Opinions by their Interests. Mean time, the Pope had the Mortification to see his Authority contemned, without being able to help it; since the People were not for him, in which case he ever darts his Thunders to no manner of purpose. Whilst the Barons and Londoners were taking these vigorous Resolutions against the Pope, John continued ravaging the Kingdom, and especially the Lands of the confederate Barons (6). It is easy to conceive, that the manner of the foreign Troops executing his Orders, was none of the mildest, and that numberless Outrages and Cruelties were committed on this occasion, which increased the Animosity of the Barons against the King (7).

Mean time, the confederate Barons were in a deplorable Condition. Instead of recovering their Possessions, they beheld their Estates plundered and given to Foreigners, whilst the King was with pleasure glutting his Revenge. Their wretched State caused them at last to take a desperate Course, which engaged them to hazard their own with the whole Kingdom's Ruin, to have the Satisfaction of being revenged on the King, though at the Expence of the poor People. They acquainted the King of France (8), that if he would send Prince Lewis his Son, they promised to set the Crown of England on his Head, provided he brought sufficient Forces to free them from the Tyranny of King John. Philip did not want much intreaty to accept of the Barons Offer. He had once before thought of conquering England, and if the Loss of his Fleet, much more than the Threats of the Pope, had made him desist from his Enterprize, he had still a longing desire to accomplish it, if a fair Opportunity should offer. And as this which the Rupture between John and the Barons furnished him with, seemed very favorable, he embraced it immediately. He only desired the Barons to deliver twenty five Hostages

1210. should claim, he should be always ready to give him a reasonable Satisfaction. Innocent was forced to be satisfied with this Reply, alleged not so much to prove the Justice of Lewis's Title, as to show a Deference to the Pope in debating the matter before him. Whatever his Decision might be, Lewis was resolved to prosecute his pretended Right, which he grounded much more upon Force than Equity.

The French and English Troops being employed in the Siege of Dover and Windsor, John, who till then thought himself too weak to venture to take the Field, left Winchester, and march'd into Norfolk and Suffolk, where he committed great Ravages (1). But hearing the Barons had rais'd the Siege of Windsor, with intent to give him Battle, he retir'd to an advantageous Post near Stamford, where it would have been very difficult to attack him (2). He took care not to hazard a Battle, apprehensive as he was, that the Officers of his Army, most of whom were Subjects of the King of France, would make their Peace with Lewis by some notable Treachery. He was further induc'd to avoid fighting, by the Advantages he expected from prolonging the War. He believed he had reason to hope, the English would quickly grow weary of the French, who began already to take very much upon them, never troubling themselves to conform to their Temper and Ways. John's expectations were not groundless. The Barons were extremely grieved to see all the Rewards distributed to the Fore-guards, and their own Inheritances bestow'd on the Favorites of the Prince whom they had sent for, as if the English had no Right to the Conquests that were making. But all this would not perhaps have been sufficient to engage them to take other measures, if what they learnt from the Mouth of the Viscount de Melun, one of Lewis's prime Confidants, had not as it were forc'd them to think of their Safety. If certain Historians are to be credited, this Nobleman being seized by a mortal Distemper at London, caus'd such of the Barons as were posted there for the Security of the City, to be sent for. When they came, he told them, he could not forbear discovering a Secret, which lay heavy upon his Conscience, and if longer conceal'd from the English, would infallibly drag them to utter Destruction. Then he disclos'd to them that the Prince was resolv'd to banish all the Barons that had taken Arms against King John, as Traitors to their Country (3). He added, this Resolution was taken in a Council of sixteen French Lords, (of whom he himself was one), and confirm'd by the Prince with an Oath. He declar'd upon the Word of a dying Man, what he said was true, and ought to be the less questioned as he was just going to appear before the Tribunal of God. The French Historians call this Secret a Fiction. It must be confess'd, it is hard to conceive, what should induce Prince Lewis to make such an Oath beforehand, in the Presence of sixteen Witnesses, supposing he intended thereby to insinuate, that this would be a means amply to reward their Services. For it would have been very imprudent to reveal so early to black a Design. However, whether the Thing was true, or invented to sow Discord between the French and English, this pretended Secret being whipp'd about, made a very deep Impression on the Minds of the Barons. It had the greater Effect, as it agreed with the Suspicions the Barons had already conceiv'd of the French. From thenceforward many began to repent of calling in the Foreigners, and seriously to think of returning to the Obedience of their Sovereign. Nay, no less than Forty privately gave the King Assurances of their good Intentions. But the rest durst not venture to trust a Prince whom they had so grievously offended, and with whose cruel and revengeful Temper they were too well acquainted.

Mean time that unhappy Prince was in perpetual Motion, not knowing whom to trust, being suspicious of his own Friends. For which reason he carefully avoided fighting, and incessantly march'd from place to place, to break the measures of his Enemies. He thought himself safest in the County of Norfolk, where he chose the little Town of Lynn to secure his Treasures, his Crown, Sceptre, and other Things of value. This Town had express'd for him such Affection and Loyalty, that as a Mark of his Gratitude he granted it great Privileges. Among other Things, he made it a Mayor-Town, and presented the first Mayor with his own Sword, which he still carefully kept there. However, as he found himself press'd by the Barons, and fearing his Treasures were not safe at Lynn, he resolv'd to remove them to a certain Place in Lincolnshire, where he intended to retire. He very narrowly escap'd drowning with his whole Army in the large Marsh (4), which parts the two Counties of Lincoln and Norfolk. Before he was quite over, the Tide coming up the River Well-stream, which overflows the Marsh-land at High-Water put him in extreme Danger. But if he escap'd himself he could not save his Baggage, which was all swallow'd up by the Waters. He arriv'd that Night at Swines-head Abbey, where he lodg'd. His vexation for his Loss, which was irretrievable in his present Circumstances, threw him into a violent Fever, which was heighten'd by incon siderately eating Peaches (5). On the morrow, not being able to ride, he was carried in a Litter to Sleaford Castle, from whence the next Day he proceeded to Newark. Here finding his Illness encrease, he made his Will, and appointed Henry his eldest Son, then but ten years of Age, his Heir. The care of his Salvation employ'd his thoughts during the rest of his Sickness, which put an end to his Days on the 18th of October 1216, in the fifty first Year of his Age, after an unhappy Reign of seventeen years, seven months, and ten days. His Body was carry'd to Worcester according to his own order, and buried with little Funeral Pomp in the Cathedral, where his Tomb [with his Image upon it] is still to be seen (6). Some will have it that he was poison'd by a Monk of Swines-head Abbey; but that is very improbable, since it is not mention'd by any of the Contemporary Historians (7). If this Prince's Character be drawn according to Matthew Paris, his chief Historian, he must be represented as one of the vilest Wretches that ever lived. But, as I have elsewhere observ'd, the Histories of Princes, who have had any Contests with the Court of Rome, are to be read with great caution. It is better therefore, without regarding the particular Sentiments and Expressions of the Historians, solely to examine the Actions of this Monarch, in order to discover his Temper and Inclinations. It is certain, one must frame a very disadvantageous Idea of him, when one considers his unjust Proceedings with regard to his Brother Richard: The Death of Prince Arthur his Nephew, of which he never clear'd himself thoroughly: The perpetual Imprisonment of Eleanor of Bretagne his Niece: His putting away Aysia of Gloucester: His extreme Indolence, when Philip Augustus was conquering his Dominions in France: His base resignation of his Crown to the Pope: His Breach of Faith with his Barons. And lastly, his bringing into the Kingdom an Army of Foreign Mercenaries, to be revenged of his Subjects. However, if one had a mind to undertake his Vindication upon most of these Articles, it would not perhaps be so difficult as it seems at first Sight. But without meddling with a Subject, which would lead me too far, I shall content myself with saying of this Prince, what I elsewhere said of William Rufus: That finding in King John scarce one valuable Qualification, it is not worth while to stay to justify some particular Actions, though it evidently appears, that the Writers of his Life have drawn him in blacker colours than he deserv'd. This Prince had great Failings, which would not have been so visible or so aggravated by the Historians, had he been Contemporary with a King of France of less Policy and Ambition, with a Pope of less Pride and more Conscience, and with a Nobility of a less turbulent Spirit. As for raising Taxes, without the Consent of the States, it may be said, it was not very unusual since Heliham the Conqueror, as the Reader may have observ'd in some former Reigns. And yet this is what several modern Historians bitterly exclaim against, as if in those Days England enjoy'd the same Privileges as at present. It is easy to see Things were then upon a different Foot, when it is consider'd, that there was a Necessity to recur to the time of the Saxon Kings, to find the Foundations of their Privileges.

King John's Fortune never agreed with his Temper. He was a lover of Ease and Quiet, and his Fortune was to

But, as I have elsewhere observ'd, the Histories of Princes, who have had any Contests with the Court of Rome, are to be read with great caution. It is better therefore, without regarding the particular Sentiments and Expressions of the Historians, solely to examine the Actions of this Monarch, in order to discover his Temper and Inclinations. It is certain, one must frame a very disadvantageous Idea of him, when one considers his unjust Proceedings with regard to his Brother Richard: The Death of Prince Arthur his Nephew, of which he never clear'd himself thoroughly: The perpetual Imprisonment of Eleanor of Bretagne his Niece: His putting away Aysia of Gloucester: His extreme Indolence, when Philip Augustus was conquering his Dominions in France: His base resignation of his Crown to the Pope: His Breach of Faith with his Barons. And lastly, his bringing into the Kingdom an Army of Foreign Mercenaries, to be revenged of his Subjects. However, if one had a mind to undertake his Vindication upon most of these Articles, it would not perhaps be so difficult as it seems at first Sight. But without meddling with a Subject, which would lead me too far, I shall content myself with saying of this Prince, what I elsewhere said of William Rufus: That finding in King John scarce one valuable Qualification, it is not worth while to stay to justify some particular Actions, though it evidently appears, that the Writers of his Life have drawn him in blacker colours than he deserv'd. This Prince had great Failings, which would not have been so visible or so aggravated by the Historians, had he been Contemporary with a King of France of less Policy and Ambition, with a Pope of less Pride and more Conscience, and with a Nobility of a less turbulent Spirit. As for raising Taxes, without the Consent of the States, it may be said, it was not very unusual since Heliham the Conqueror, as the Reader may have observ'd in some former Reigns. And yet this is what several modern Historians bitterly exclaim against, as if in those Days England enjoy'd the same Privileges as at present. It is easy to see Things were then upon a different Foot, when it is consider'd, that there was a Necessity to recur to the time of the Saxon Kings, to find the Foundations of their Privileges.

King John's Fortune never agreed with his Temper. He was a lover of Ease and Quiet, and his Fortune was to took such Indignation, that he went and put the Portion of a Tread into a Cup of Wine, and came and drank to the King, which made him pledge him self upon it, not putting himself very much out of order upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him he was dead, God have mercy upon it, says the King, I would as much. But it is a very improbable Story, for a Man to poison himself to revenge of another. But that he had by a Dish of Peas which he poisoned all but the King, then he told him he was dead, God have mercy upon it, which he

(I) Charta Regis WILLIELMI conquistoris.

De religione & pace publica.

I. Statuimus imprimis super omnia, unum Deum per totum regnum nostrum venerari, unam fidem Christi semper inviolatam custodiri, pacem, & securitatem & concordiam, iudicium & iustitiam inter Anglos & Normannos, Francos & Britones Walliæ & Cornubiæ, Pictos, & Scotos Albanice, similiter inter Francos & Insulanos, provincias & patrias, quas pertinent ad coronam & dignitatem, defensionem & observationem & honorem regni nostri, & inter omnes nobis subiectos per universam monarchiam regni Britannice firmiter & inviolabiliter observari. Ita quod nullus alii forisfaciat in ullo super forisfacturam nostram plenam.

De fide & obsequio erga regem.

II. Statuimus etiam ut omnes liberi homines federe & sacramento affirmant, quod intra & extra universum regnum Anglie (quod olim vocabatur regnum Britannice) Willielmo regi domino suo fideles esse volunt, terras & honores illius omni fidelitate ubique servare cum eo, & contra inimicos & alienigenas defendere.

De Normanni seu Francigenæ cæde.

III. Volumus autem & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes homines, quos nobiscum adduximus, aut post nos venerint, sint sub protectione & in pace nostra per universum regnum prædictum; & si quis de illis occisus fuerit, dominus ejus habeat intra V. dies homicidam ejus si poterit; sin autem, incipiat perolvere nobis XLVI marcas argenti, quandiu substantia domini illius perduraverit: Ubi vero substantia domini defecerit, totus hundredus in quo occisio facta est, communiter solvat quod remanet.

IV. Et omnis Francigena, qui tempore Edwardi propinqui nostri fuit in Anglia particeps consuetudinum Anglorum, quod ipsi dicunt (2) Anhote & Ansote, persolvat secundum legem Anglorum.

De clientelari seu Feudorum jure, & Ingenuorum immunitate.

V. Volumus etiam ac firmiter præcipimus & concedimus, ut omnes liberi homines totius Monarchiæ regni nostri prædicti, habeant & teneant terras suas & possessiones suas bene & in pace, libere ab omni exactione injusta, & ab omni tallagio, ita quod nichil ab eis exigatur vel capiatur, nisi servicium suum liberum, quod de jure nobis facere debent & facere tenentur; & prout statutum est eis & illis a nobis datum & concessum jure hæreditario imperpetuum, per commune concilium totius regni nostri prædicti.

VI. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes Civitates & Burgi & Castella & Hundredi & Wapentachia totius regni nostri prædicti, singulis noctibus vigilentur & custodiantur in gyrum, pro maleficis & inimicis, prout vicecomes & aldermanni, & præpositi & ceteri ballivi & ministri nostri melius, per Commune Consilium ad utilitatem regni, providebunt.

De mensuris & ponderibus.

VII. Et quod habeant per universum regnum mensuras fidelissimas & signatas, & pondera fidelissima & signata, sicut boni prædecessores statuerunt.

De Clientum seu Vassallorum præstationibus.

VIII. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes comites & barones, milites, & servientes, & universi liberi homines totius regni nostri prædicti, habeant & teneant se semper bene in armis & in equis, ut decet & oportet, & quod sint semper prompti & bene parati ad servicium suum integrum nobis explendum & peragendum, cum semper opus adfuerit, secundum quod nobis debeat de feodis & tenementis suis, de jure facere, & sicut illis statuimus, per Commune Concilium totius regni nostri prædicti, & illis dedimus & concessimus in feodo jure hæreditario; hoc præceptum non sit violatum ullo modo, super forisfacturam nostram plenam.

IX. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes liberi homines totius regni nostri prædicti sint fratres conjurati ad monarchiam nostram & ad regnum nostrum pro viribus suis & facultatibus, contra inimicos pro posse suo defendendum & viriliter servandum, & pacem & dignitatem coronæ nostræ integram observandam, & ad iudicium rectum, & iustitiam constanter omnibus modis pro posse suo sine dolo & sine dilatione faciendam. [Hoc Decretum sanctum est in Civitate London.]

Ne venditio & emptio fiat nisi coram testibus & in civitatibus.

X. Interdicimus etiam, ut nulla viva (3) pecunia vendatur aut ematur nisi intra civitates, & hoc ante tres fideles testes, nec aliquam rem vitatam, sine fideiussore & warranto: quod si aliter fecerit, solvat & persolvat & postea forisfacturam.

De emporiis & jure urbium, pagorumque notæ mellioris.

XI. Item nullum mercatum vel forum sit, nec fieri permittantur, nisi in civitatibus regni nostri, in burgis & muro vallatis, & in castellis & in locis tutissimis, ubi consuetudines regni nostri & jus nostrum commune & dignitatis coronæ nostræ, que constituta sunt a bonis prædecessoribus nostris deperiri non possunt, nec defraudari, nec violari, sed omnia rite & in aperto & per iudicium & iustitiam fieri debent. Et ideo castella, & burgi & civitates fixæ sunt & fundatæ, & edificatæ, scilicet, ad tuitionem gentium & populorum regni, & ad defensionem regni, & ideo observari debent cum omni libertate & integritate & ratione.

De purgatione forensi in iudiciis publicis.

XII. Decretum est etiam (4) ibi, ut si Francigena appellaverit Anglum de perjurio aut murthero, furto, homicidio, (Ran quod dicunt) apertam rapinam que negari non potest, Anglus se defendat per quod melius voluerit, aut iudicio ferri, aut duello: Si autem Anglus infirmus fuerit, inveniat alium, qui pro eo faciat: Si quis eorum victus fuerit, emendet regi XL solidi. Si autem Anglus Francigenam appellaverit, & probare voluerit iudicio aut duello, volo tunc Francigenam purgare se sacramento, non ferro.

XIII. Hoc quoque præcipimus ut omnes habeant & teneant leges Edwardi regis in omnibus rebus, adausis his, quas constitimus ad utilitatem Anglorum.

De iustitiæ publicæ fideiussoribus.

XIV. Omnis homo qui voluerit se teneri pro libero, sit in plegio, ut plegius cum habeat ad iustitiam, si quid offenderit, & quicumque evaserit, talium videant plegii, ut solvant, quod calumniatum est, & purgent se quodam evolo nullam fraudem noverint. Requiritur hundredus & comitatus (sicut antecessores statuerunt) & qui iuste venire debent & noluerint, summoneantur semel; & si secundo non venerint, accipiat unus bos; & si tertio, alius bos; & si quarto, reddatur de rebus huius hominis quod calumpniatum est, quod dicitur Ceathgel, & insuper regis forisfactura.

De servis & eorum manumissione.

XV. Et prohibemus ut nullus vendat hominem extra patriam; si qui vero velit servum suum liberum facere, tradat eum vicecomiti per manum dextram in pleno comitatu, quietum illum clamare debet a iugo servitutis fure per manumissionem, & ostendat ei liberam viam & portas, & tradat illi libera arma, scilicet lanceam & gladium, deinde liber homo efficitur.

De servis.

XVI. Item si servi permanferint sine calutunia per annum & diem in civitatibus nostris, vel in burgis muro vallatis, vel in castris nostris, a die illi liberi efficiuntur, & liberi a iugo servitutis fure sint imperpetuum.

De supplicorum modo.

XVII. Interdicimus etiam, ne quis occidatur vel suspendatur pro aliqua culpa, sed enervantur oculi & abscindantur pedes, vel testiculi vel manus, ita quod truncus remaneat vivus in signum proditiōis & nequitie fure, secundum enim quantitatem delicti debet pena maleficis infligi: ista precepta non sint violata super forisfacturam nostram plenam. Alia charta continens institutiones five leges Regis Willielmi; quæ videntur additiones prioribus (1).

scriptum hoc perveniat, salutem & amicitiam, quod mandando & precipio per totam Angliæ nationem custodiri.

De examine forensi.

XVIII. Si Anglicus homo compellet aliquem Francigenam per (2) bellum de furto vel homicidio vel aliqua re pro qua bellum fieri debeat, vel iudicium inter duos homines, habeat plenam licentiam faciendi. Et si Anglicus bellum nolit, Francigena compellatur adlegiet se in iurando contra eum per suos testes secundum legem Normannie.

De eodem.

XIX. Item si Francigena compellat Anglicum per bellum de eisdem rebus, Anglicus plena licentia defendat se per bellum vel per iudicium, si magis ei placeat. Et si untrum sit, (id est invalidus) & nolit bellum vel non possit, querat sibi legalem defenforem.

De eodem.

XX. Si Francigena victus fuerit, persolvat regi LX solidi. Et si Anglicus nolit se defendere per bellum vel per testimonium, adlegiet semper (3) Dei iudicium.

De examine forensi.

XXI. De omnibus Utlagariæ rebus, rex instituit, ut Anglicus se purget ad iudicium; & si Anglicus appellet Francigenam, de Utlagaria & hoc super eum invenire velit, defendat se Francigena per bellum. Et si Anglicus non audeat eum probare per bellum, defendat se Francigena pleno iuramento, non in verborum observantiis.

Charta Libertatum Regis HENRICI primi.

HENRICUS Dei gratia, rex Angliæ, &c. Hugoni de Boclande vicecomiti & omnibus fidelibus suis tam Francis quam Anglicis in Herefordshire salutem. Sciatz me Dei misericordia & Communi Consilio baronum regni Angliæ regem esse coronatum.

I. Et quia regnum oppressum erat iniustis exactionibus, ego respectu Dei & amore, quem erga vos omnes habeo, sanctam Dei ecclesiam liberam facio, ita quod nec eam vendam nec ad firmam ponam, nec mortuo archiepiscopo vel episcopo, vel abbate, aliquid accipiam de dominio ecclesie, vel de hominibus, donec successerit in eam ingrediatur.

II. Et omnes malas consuetudines, quibus regnum Angliæ iniuste opprimebatur, inde aufero, quas malas consuetudines in parte hic pono.

III. Siquis baronum meorum, comitum, vel aliorum, qui de me tenent, mortuus fuerit, hæres suus non redimet terram suam, sicut facere consueverat tempore patris mei, sed iusta & legitima relevatione relevabit eam: similiter & (4) homines baronum meorum legitima & iusta relevatione relevabunt terras suas de dominiis suis.

IV. Et si quis baronum vel aliorum hominum meorum, filiam suam tradere voluerit, five sororem, five neptem, five cognatam, mecum inde loquatur, sed neque ego aliquid de suo pro hac licentia accipiam, neque defendam ei, quin eam det, excepto si eam dare voluerit inimico meo.

V. Et si mortuo barone vel alio homine meo, filia hæres remanserit, dabo illam cum consilio baronum meorum cum terra sua.

VI. Et si mortuo marito, uxor ejus remanserit, & sine liberis fuerit, dotem suam, & maritagium habebit, & eam non dabo marito, nisi secundum velle suum. Si vero uxor cum liberis remanserit, dotem suam & maritagium habebit, dum corpus suum legitime servabit; & eam non dabo nisi secundum velle suum, & terræ liberorum custos erit five uxor, five alius propinquior, qui iustus esse debet: & precipio, ut homines mei similes se contineant erga filios & filias & uxores, hominum suorum.

VII. Monetagium commune, quod capiebatur per civitates vel comitatus, quod non fuit tempore Edwardi regis, hoc ne amodo fiat omnino defendo.

VIII. Si quis captus fuerit five monetarius five alius cum falsa moneta, iustitia recta inde fiat.

IX. Omnia placita & omnia debita, quæ regi fratri meo debebantur, condono, exceptis firmis meis, & exceptis illis, quæ pacta erant pro aliorum hæreditatibus, vel pro illis rebus, quæ iustis alios contingebant. Et si quis aliquid pro hæreditate sua pepigerat, illud condono & omnes relevationes, quæ pro rectis hæreditatibus pactæ erant.

X. Et si quis baronum vel hominum meorum infirmabitur, sicut ipse dabit vel dare disposuerit, pecuniam suam: ita datum esse concedo.

XI. Quod si ipse præventus, vel armis, vel infirmitate, pecuniam suam nec dederit, nec dare disposuerit, uxor sua, five liberi aut parentes, & legitimi homines sui, pro anima ejus eam dividant: sicut eis melius visum fuerit.

XII. Si quis baronum vel hominum meorum forisfecerit, non dabit vadium in miseria pecunie sue, sicut faciebat tempore patris, vel fratris mei, sed secundum forisfacturæ modum: nec ita emendabit sicut emendasset retro tempore patris mei vel fratris.

XIII. Quod si perfidie vel sceleris convictus fuerit, sicut culpa, sic emendet.

XIV. Murdra etiam retro ab illa die, qua in regem coronatus sum, omnia condono, & ea quæ amodo facta fuerint, iuste emendentur secundum legem regis Edwardi.

XV. Forestas Communi Consilio baronum meorum in manu mea, ita retinui, sicut pater meus eas habuit.

XVI. Militibus, qui per loricas terras suas defendunt, terras dominicarum carucarum suarum quietas ab omnibus geldis & omni proprio, dono meo concedo; ut sicut tam magno gravamine allevati sunt, ita equis & armis bene se instruant, ut apti & parati sint ad servitium meum, & ad censionem regni mei.

XVII. Pacem firmam pono in toto regno meo, & teneri amodo præcipio. Legem regis Edwardi vobis redeo, cum illis emendationibus, quibus pater meus eam emendavit, consilio baronum suorum.

XVIII. Si quis aliquid de modo, vel de rebus alienis post obitum regis Willielmi fratris mei cepit, totum ei reddatur absque emendatione; & si quis inde aliquid retinuerit, ille super quem inventum fuerit, graviter mihi emendabit.

II. Nihil me in ecclesia, vel in rebus ecclesiasticis symoniace acturum, vel permittiturum esse promitto.

III. Ecclesiasticarum personarum & omnium clericorum, & rerum eorum iustitiam & potestatem & distributionem bonorum ecclesiasticorum manu episcoporum esse, prohibeo & confirmo.

IV. Dignitates ecclesiarum, privilegiis earum confirmatas, & consuetudines earum antiquo tenore habitas, inviolate manere concedo & statuo.

V. Omnes ecclesiarum possessiones, & tenuras, quas die illa habuerant, qua Willielmus rex avus meus fuit vivus & mortuus, sine omnium calumniantium reclamacione eis liberarum & absolutarum esse concedo.

VI. Si quid vero de habitis aut possessis ante mortem regis, quibus modo careat, ecclesia, deinceps repeteret, indulgentiæ & dispensationi mee vel discutiendum, vel restituendum reservo.

VII. Quæcunque vero post mortem regis liberalitate regum, largitione principum, oblatione, vel comparatione, vel qualibet transmutatione fidelium collata sunt confirmo.

VIII. Pacem meam & iustitiam in omnibus sacrum & pro posse meo conservatum promitto.

IX. Forestas quas Willielmus rex avus meus, & Willielmus avunculus meus instituerant & tenuerunt, mihi reservo. Cæteras omnes, quas Henricus rex superaddidit, ecclesias & regno quietas reddo & concedo.

X. Si quis autem episcopus vel abbas, vel alia ecclesiastica persona ante mortem suam rationabiliter sua destruxerit, vel distribuenda statuerit, firmum manere concedo.

XI. Si vero morte præoccupatus fuerit, pro salute anime ejus, ecclesiæ consilio eadem fiat distributio.

XII. Dum vero sedes propriis fuerint pastoribus vacuæ, & ipsæ, & omnes earum possessiones, in manu & custodia clericorum vel proborum hominum, ejusdem ecclesiæ committantur, donec pastor canonice substituitur.

XIII. Omnes exactiones & Mescheningas, & injustitias, siue per vice-comites, vel per alios quolibet male inductas, funditus extirpo. Bonas leges & antiquas & iustas consuetudines in murdris, & placitis & aliis causis observabo, & observari præcipio, & constituo: apud Oxeneford anno incarnationis Domini 1136. regni mei primo.

(3) That is, all Ecclesiastical persons within the Realm, their Possessions and Goods, shall be freed from all unjust Exactions and Oppressions, without shuffling shall yield any lawful Duties, either to the King, or to any of his Subjects. See, ibid.

(4) No new Rights, Liberties, or Privileges, were introduced into Ecclesiastical Persons, but such as they had before, were confirmed unto them. See, p. 3.

(6) There was never a Duke, Marquis, or Viscount then in England. The first Duke was Edward the Black Prince, who was created Duke of Cornwall, in 11 Edo. III. Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford was created Marquis of Dublin in 8. Ro. II. The first Viscount was Arnold, and the first Earl, by patent by that Name, was John de Vere, created 18 Henry VI. See, p. 5. For an account of the Titles of English Barons, see above, p. 149, 150; and See, l. 1. Col. of Honor.

(7) In the understanding of this Article, it must be observed, That when any of the King's Tenants in chief died, the King, as Common to the Heir, seized his Lands; which remained in his Hands, till the Heir was of Age. But when the Heir came to his full age, he was required, as we have seen, to move his Lands, upon giving him 100 to the King, and paying a certain Comp. (namely Relief), which at that time was 100 shillings, to every Man's degree, from an Earl to a Peasant. See above, p. 191. Note (13); and p. 247. Col. 11. And it is plain, that sometimes a Baron's Heir, &c. &c. Relief, there had been, a heavy Incumbent of an ancient Rent, at will of a Lord, who, in such a case, the Tenant, was obliged to make satisfaction, &c. &c. See above, p. 191. Note (13). This Cause therefore, was the Matter again upon its ancient footing. See our Notes, Relief, on page 191.

heredes militis de feodo militis integro per centum solidos ad plus : & qui minus debuerit, minus det secundum antiquam consuetudinem feodorum.

IV. Si autem heres alicujus talium fuerit infra etatem, & fuerit in custodia : cum ad etatem pervenerit, habeat hereditatem suam sine relevio & sine fine.

V. Custos terre hujusmodi heredis qui infra etatem fuerit, non capiat de terra heredis nisi rationabiles exitus, & rationabiles consuetudines, & rationabilia servitia, & hoc sine destructione & vasto hominum vel rerum. Et si nos commiserimus custodiam alicujus talis terre vicecomiti vel alicui alii qui de exitibus illius nobis respondere debeat, & ille destructionem de custodia fecerit vel vastum, nos ab illo capiemus emendam, & terra committatur duobus legalibus & discretis hominibus de feodo illo, qui de exitibus respondeant nobis vel ei cui eos assignaverimus. Et si dederimus vel vendiderimus alicui custodiam alicujus talis terre, & ille destructionem inde fecerit vel vastum, amittat ipsam custodiam, & tradatur duobus legalibus & discretis hominibus de feodo illo, qui similiter nobis respondeant, sicut predictum est.

VI. Custos autem quamdiu custodiam terre habuerit, sufficienter domos, parcos, vivaria, stagna, molendina, & cetera ad terram illam pertinentia de exitibus terre ejusdem, & reddat heredi cum ad plenam etatem pervenerit terram suam totam infrastratam de carrucis & wainagiis secundum quod tempus wainagii exigit, & exitus terre rationabiliter poterunt sustinere.

VII. Heredes maritentur absque disparagione; ita tamen quod antequam contrahatur matrimonium, ostendatur propinquis de consanguinitate ipsius heredis.

VIII. Vidua post mortem mariti sui statim & sine difficultate habeat maritagium & hereditatem suam; nec aliquid det pro dote sua vel pro maritagio suo, vel hereditate sua, quam hereditatem maritus suus & ipsa tenuerint die obitus ipsius mariti; & maneat in domo mariti sui per quadraginta dies post mortem ipsius, infra quos assignetur ei dos sua.

IX. Nulla vidua distringatur ad se maritandum, dum voluerit vivere sine marito. Ita tamen quod securitatem faciat quod se non maritabit sine assensu nostro, si de nobis tenuerit, vel sine assensu domini sui de quo tenuerit si de alio tenuerit.

X. Nec nos, nec ballivi nostri seisiemus terram aliquam nec redditum pro debito aliquo, quamdiu catalla debitoris sufficient ad debitum reddendum: Nec pleggii ipsius debitoris distringantur, quamdiu ipse capitalis debitor sufficit ad solutionem debiti.

XI. Et

XI. And

(a) [His Lord shall not have the Wardship of him, nor his Land, before he hath received his Homage; and after such Heir shall be in Ward, and shall attain to the Age of one and twenty Years.]

(b) [Yet so, that if he be made a Knight (4) while he is under Age, nevertheless the Lands shall remain in the Custody of the Lord, untill the aforesaid Time.]

(c) [Upon the Estate.]

(d) [And all these things shall be observed in the Custodies of vacant Archbishopsricks, Bishopsricks, Abbies, Priorities, Churches and Dignities which appertain to us; except that these Wardships are not to be sold.]

(e) [If it was not assigned before, or unless the House shall be a Castle; and if the departs from the Castle; there shall forthwith be provided for her a complete House, in which she may decently dwell, till her Dowry be to her assigned, as hath been said; and she shall in the mean time have her reasonable Essevoir, (i. e. competent Maintenance) out of the common [Revenue.] And there shall be assigned to her for her Dowry, the third Part of all her Husband's Lands which were his in his Life time, except she were endowed with less at the Church-Door.]

(f) [And that the Debtor be ready to satisfy it.]

(1) The Customary Copy has a hundred Pounds; which seems to be a mistake. For the antient Relief of an Earldom, a Barony, and the Living of a Bishop, was the fortieth part of the yearly Value of them. Now, the yearly Value of a Barony was to consist of thirteen Knight's Fees and a quarter, which, by full Account amounted to four hundred Marks a Year, therefore his Relief was a hundred Marks, and not a hundred Pounds. See C. 43, in the Statute of Charl. II. c. 25.

(2) As long as the Heirs of the King's Tenants in chief were under Age, they were said to be in Ward. But this Wardship was taken away by the Statute of Charl. II. c. 25.

(3) By Issues, are meant, the Rents and Profits issuing out, or coming of the Lands or Tenements of the Ward. By Customs, things due by Custom or Prescription, and appendant to the Lands or Tenements in Ward; as Advowsons, Common, Stray, &c. also Fines of Tenants by Copy of Court-Roll. By Servitia, the Drudgery and Labour due from Copy-holders to their Lords. See above, p. 150. and Notes, and C. 43, p. 12, 13.

(4) By being made a Knight, the Heir was out of Ward as to his Body; but his Land remained in the Custody of the Lord, as is said in this Article. See C. 43, p. 11.

(5) That is, according to their Rank, &c. Disparagement in a legal Sense, was used for matching an Heir in Marriage under his Degree, or a poor Dowry. See Inst. lib. 1. c. 2. §. 2.

(6) Essevoir, that is, she shall have liberty to marry where she will. It appears by Beaumont, that a Woman who was an Heir, could not marry without the Leave and Consent of the Lords of whom her Estates were held; otherwise she forfeited them. Bract. l. 2. p. 88. C. 43, p. 10.

(7) Complend is to be at the bed.

(8) As this note is in the old and is Under Balliffs are intended and meant, says Sir Edward Coke, p. 19.

(9) By estate of the King's Law, the King has the Duke had Execution of the Body, Lord, and Costs of the Debtor; so that this is an Act of Grace, as to the Power, the King had before. C. 43, lib.

Barony, by an hundred Pounds (1); the Heir or Heirs of a Knight, for a whole Knight's Fee, by an hundred Shillings at most; and he that oweth less shall give less, according to the antient Custom of Fees.

IV. But if the Heir of any such shall be under Age, and shall be in (2) Ward (a), when he comes of Age, he shall have his Inheritance without Relief or without Fine (b).

V. The Warden of the Land of such Heir, who shall be under Age, shall take of the Land of such Heir only reasonable Issues, reasonable Customs, and reasonable Services (3); and that without Destruction and Waste of the Men or Things (c): And if we shall commit the Guardianship of those Lands to the Sheriff, or any other, who is answerable to us for the Issues of the Land; and if he shall make Destruction and Waste upon the Ward-Lands, we will compel him to give Satisfaction, and the Land shall be committed to two lawful and discreet Tenants of that Fee, who shall be answerable for the Issues to us, or to him whom we shall assign. And if we shall give or sell the Wardship of any such Lands to any one, and he make Destruction or Waste upon them, he shall lose the Wardship, which shall be committed to two lawful and discreet Tenants of that Fee, who shall in like manner be answerable to us, as hath been said.

VI. But the Warden, so long as he shall have the Wardship of the Land, shall keep up and maintain the Houses, Parks, Warrens, Ponds, Mills, and other things pertaining to the Land, out of the Issues of the same Land; and shall restore to the Heir, when he comes of full Age, his whole Land stocked with Ploughs and Carriages, according as the time of Wainage shall require, and the Issues of the Land can reasonably bear (d).

VII. Heirs shall be married without disparagement (5), [so as that before Matrimony shall be contracted, those who are nearest to the Heir in Blood shall be made acquainted with it.]

VIII. A Widow, after the death of her Husband, shall forthwith, and without any difficulty, have her Marriage (6), and her Inheritance; nor shall she give any thing for her Dowry, or her Marriage, or her Inheritance, which her Husband and she held at the day of his death: And she may remain in the Capital Mesuage or Mansion-House of her Husband, forty days after his death; within which Term her Dowry shall be assigned (e).

IX. No Widow shall be deſtein'd (7) to marry herself so long as she has a mind to live without a Husband. But yet she shall give Security that she will not marry without our Assent, if she holds of Us; or without the Consent of the Lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another.

X. Neither we nor our Bailiffs (8) shall seize any Land (9) or Rent for any Debt, so long as there shall be Chattels of the Debtor's upon the Premises, sufficient to pay the Debt (f). Nor shall the Sureties of the Debtor be distrained, so long as the principal Debtor is sufficient for the payment of the Debt.

XI. Et si capitalis debitor defecerit in solutione debiti, non habens unde solvat, pleggi respondeant de debito, & si voluerint habere terras & redditus debitoris, donec sit eis satisfactum de debito quod ante pro eo solverint, nisi capitalis debitor monstraverit se esse quietum inde versus eosdem pleggios.

XII. Si quis mutuo cepit aliquid a Judeis plus vel minus, & moriatur antequam debitum illud solvatur, debitum non uretur quamdiu heres fuerit infra etatem, de quocumque tenent; & si debitum illud inciderit in manus nostras, nos non capiemus nisi cattallum contentum in charta.

XIII. Et si quis moriatur, & debitum debeat Judeis, uxor ejus habeat dotem suam, & nichil reddat de debito illo; & si liberi ipsius defuncti, qui fuerint infra etatem, remanserint, provideantur eis necessaria secundum tenementum quod fuerit defuncti; & de residuo solvatur debitum, salvo servitio dominorum. Simili modo fiat de debitis que debentur aliis quam Judeis.

XIV. Nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno nostro nisi per Commune Consilium regni nostri, nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum; & primogenitum filium nostrum militem faciendum; & ad filium nostrum primogenitum femel maritandam; & ad hec non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium.

XV. Simili modo fiat de auxiliis de civitate London. & civitas London. habeat omnes antiquas libertates, & liberas consuetudines suas tam per terras quam per aquas.

XVI. Preterea volumus & concedimus, quod omnes alie civitates, & burgi, & ville, & portus habeant omnes libertates & liberas consuetudines suas, et ad habendum Commune Consilium regni de auxilio assidendo aliter quam in tribus casibus predictis.

XVII. Vel de scutagio assidendo, summoneri faciemus archiepiscopos, episcopos, abbates, comites, & majores barones sigillatim per litteras nostras.

XVIII. Et preterea faciemus summoneri in generali per vicecomites, & ballivos nostros omnes illos qui de nobis tenent in capite ad certum diem, scilicet ad terminum quadraginta dierum ad minus, & ad certum locum, & in omnibus litteris illius summonitionis causam summonitionis exprimemus.

XIX. Et sic facta summonitione negotium ad diem assignatum procedat secundum consilium illorum qui presentes fuerint, quamvis non omnes summoniti venerint.

XX. Nos non concedemus de cetero alicui quod capiat auxilium de liberis hominibus suis, nisi ad corpus suum redimendum; & ad faciendum primogenitum filium suum militem; & ad primogenitum filium suum femel maritandam; & ad hec non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium.

XXI. Nullus distringatur ad faciendum majus Servitium de feodo militis, nec de alio libero tenemento quam inde debetur.

XXII. Communia placita non sequantur curiam nostram, sed teneantur in aliquo loco certo. Recognitiones de nova diffinitione

XI. And if the principal Debtor fail in the Payment of the Debt, not having wherewithal to discharge it (a), then the Sureties shall answer the Debt, and if they will, they shall have the Lands and Rents of the Debtor, untill they shall be satisfied for the Debt which they paid for him; unless the principal Debtor can shew himself acquitted thereof, against the said Sureties.

XII. [If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews more or less, and dies before the Debt be satisfied, there shall be no Interest paid for that Debt, so long as the Heir is under Age, of whomsoever he may hold: And if the Debt falls into our Hands, we will take only the Chattel mentioned in the Charter or Infrment.]

XIII. [And if any one shall die indebted to the Jews, his Wife shall have her Dower, and pay nothing of that Debt; and if the deceased left Children under Age, they shall have Necessaries provided for them according to the Tenement (or real Estate) of the deceased, and out of the Residue the Debt shall be paid; saving however the Service of the Lords. In like manner let it be with the Debts due to other Persons than Jews.]

XIV. No Scutage (1) or Aid shall be imposed in our Kingdom, unless by the Common Council of our Kingdom, except to redeem our Person, and to make our eldest Son a Knight, and once to marry our eldest Daughter; and for this there shall only be paid a reasonable Aid.

XV. [In like manner it shall be concerning the Aids of the City of London; and] the City of London shall have all its ancient Liberties and free Customs, as well by Land as by Water.

XVI. Furthermore, we will and grant that all other Cities and Burroughs, and Towns (b), and Ports, shall have all their Liberties and free Customs; and shall have the Common Council of the Kingdom concerning the Assessing of their Aids (3), except in the three Cases aforesaid.

XVII. [And for the assessing of Scutages we shall cause to be summoned the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and great Barons of the Realm singly by our Letters].

XVIII. [And furthermore, we shall cause to be summoned in General by our Sheriffs and Bailiffs, all others who hold of us in Chief (4), at a certain day, that is to say, forty days (before their Meeting) at least, to a certain Place; and in all Letters of such Summonis, we will declare the Cause of the Summons.]

XIX. [And Summons being thus made, the Business shall proceed on the day appointed, according to the Advice of such as shall be present, although all that were summoned come not.]

XX. We will not for the future grant to any one, that he may take Aid of his own Free-Tenants, unless to redeem his Body; and to make his eldest Son a Knight, and once to marry his eldest Daughter; and for this there shall only be paid a reasonable Aid.

XXI. No Man shall be distrained to perform more Service for a Knight's Fee, or other Free Tenement, than is due from thence (5).

XXII. Common Pleas (6), shall not follow our Court, but shall be holden in some certain Place: Try-

(a) [Or will not discharge it when he is able.]

(b) [And Barons of the Cinque Ports (2).]

(1) Scutage was military Service, due to the King from the Tenants in Chief. It is to be understood also of what the Feudatories paid the King in lieu of that Service, and likewise of the Tax which was imposed on each Vassal for the Service of the Publick. Since William the Conqueror, the King had frequently imposed Scutages, without the Consent of the States. Rapin. See above, p. 238, 280. Note II.

(2) The Cinque Ports lay in the County of Kent. They had great Privileges, which King John himself had augmented. The Governors of them were called Baux, as they are at this Day. Rapin.

(3) That is, according to Dr. Brady's Explanation, they shall send their Representatives or Commissioners to the Common Council of the Kingdom. It seems to follow from this Article, that none but Tenants in Chief had a right to sit in the Common Council or Parliament. Otherwise it was natural to mention here the Representatives of the Commons, had they enjoyed that Right in those Days. Rapin.

(4) This was the ancient Law of England, as appears by Glanville, l. 12. c. 9, 10. Cok, p. 21. See above, p. 154. Note.

(5) It may not be amiss to give an Abstract of Madox's Hypothesis concerning the Division of the King's Court, and Erection of the Bank or Common Pleas. That the King's Court or Palace was antiently the great and principal Seat of Judicature in this Realm, has been observed in a former Note on the Paschege. But in process of time, namely, about the End of King John's Reign, the Jurisdiction of the King's Court came to be divided. And by that Division, Common Pleas were referred to a Court then newly erected, which Court was called the Bank, because it was fixed at Westmynster, at which place the Justices thereof were to sit and not to follow the King's Court. The Bank was, probably, set up in aid of the King's Court, as the King's Court was then very full. It has been, indeed, for some time past a received Opinion, that the four superior Courts holden at the Day in Westminster Hall are of equal Antiquity. This may serve to illustrate the Author's Divisions concerning the Precedence of one or other of the King's Courts, but does not seem to agree with the antient Records. For the Name or Style of the Bank, or Justices of the Bank, does not occur till long after the Norman Conquest, consequently the Bank or Common Bank was a Court different from the Curia Regis, and erected at a late Inconvenient Time. And as the Bank has all along, since the Time of the first Notice of it, sat only or chiefly in common Pleas; so it falls out, but the Curia Regis ceased to do so originally in common Pleas, about the same time the Bank is supposed to be erected. Now this Division of the King's Court seems to have begun in the Reign of Richard I. or King John, and continued in the Reign of Henry III. And to this the Great Charter, as doubtless, was very conducive. In this Article of the Magna Charta therefore, b. c. 29. regis may be understood the King's Court held in the XXXIII. No Constable or Bailiff of ours shall take Corn or other Chattels of any Man (a), unless he presently gives him Money for it, or hath respite of Payment from the Seller (b).

XXXIV. No Constable shall distrain any Knight to give Money for Castle-Guard, if he himself shall do it in his own Person, or by another able Man, in case he shall be hindred by any reasonable Cause.

XXXV. And if We shall lead him, or if We shall send him into the Army, he shall be free from Castle-Guard, for the time he shall be in the Army, by our Command (c).

XXXVI. No Sheriff or Bailiff of Ours, or any other, shall take Horses or Carts of any for Carriage (d).

XXXVII. Neither shall We or our Officers or others, take any Man's Timber for our Castles, or other Uses, unless by the Consent of the Owner of the Timber (e).

XXXVIII. We will retain the Lands of those that are convicted of Felony but one Year and a Day, and then they shall be delivered to the Lord of the Fee.

XXXIX. All Wares for the Time to come shall be demolished in the Rivers of Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the Sea-Coast.

XL. The Writ, which is called Precipe (1), for the future, shall not be granted to any one of any Tenement, whereby a Free-Man may lose his Cause.

XLI. There shall be one Measure of Wine and one of Ale, through our whole Realm, and one Measure of Corn; that is to say, the London-Quarter; and one Breadth of dyed Cloth and Russis and Haberjects (2), that is to say, Two Ells within the Liff; and the Weights shall be as the Measures.

XLII. From henceforward nothing shall be given or taken for a Writ of Inquisition (3), from him that desires an Inquisition of Life or Limbs, but shall be granted gratis, and not denied.

XLIII. If any one holds of us by Fee-Farm, or Soccage, or Burgage (4), and holds Lands of another by Military Service, We will not have the Wardship of the Heir or Land, which belongs to another Man's Fee, by reason of what he holds of us by Fee-Farm, Soccage or Burgage: Nor will we have the Wardship of the Fee-Farm, Soccage or Burgage, unless the Fee-Farm is bound to perform Military Service.

XLIV. We will not have the Wardship of an Heir, nor of any Land, which he holds of another by Military Service, by reason of any Petit-Sergeanty he holds of us, as by the Service of giving us Daggers, Arrows, or the like.

XLV. No Bailiff for the future shall put any Man to his Law (5), (f) upon his single Accusation, without credible Witnesses produced to prove it.

(b) [But if he be of the same Town, he shall pay him within forty Days.]

(c) [For the Fee, for which he did Service in the Army.]

(d) [Without paying according to the Rate antiently appointed, that is to say, for a Cart and two Horses, ten Pence a Day; and for a Cart with three Horses, fourteen Pence a Day.]

(e) [No Demesne Cart of any Ecclesiastical Person, or Knight, or any Lady, shall be taken by our Officers.]

(f) [Nor to an Oath.]

(1) The Writ called Precipe quid reddat, from the first Words in it, has several Uses. It signifies in general an Order from the King, or some Court of Justice, to put in possession one that complains of having been unjustly ousted. Apparently several Abuses had crept in upon this Article. Rapin.

(2) A sort of coarse Cloth.

(3) This was a Writ directed to the Sheriff, to enquire, whether a Man committed to Prison on Suspicion of Murder, was committed on just Cause of Suspicion, or only out of Malice and ill-will. Tract.

(4) To hold in Fee-Farm, is when there is some Rent reserved by the Lord upon the Creation of the Tenancy. In Soccage, upon Condition of plowing the Lord's Land, and doing other inferior Offices of Husbandry: And in Burgage, when the Inhabitants of a Borough held their Tenements of the King at a certain Rent. See above. p. 120.

(5) To make his Law, is as much as to say, to take his Oath, &c.

XLVI. Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut diffametur, aut utlagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruiatur; nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terre.

XLVII. Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum aut iusticiam.

XLVIII. XLVII. We will sell to no Man, we will deny no Man, or defer Right nor Justice.

XLVIII. All Merchants (b) shall have safe and secure Conduct to go out of, and to come into England (2); and to stay there, and to pass, as well by Land as by Water; to buy and sell by the ancient and allowed Customs, without any evil Tolls, except in time of War, or when they shall be of any Nation in War with us.

XLIX. And if there shall be found any such in our Land in the beginning of a War, they shall be attached, without damage to their Bodies or Goods, until it may be known unto us, or our Chief Justiciary, how our Merchants be treated in the Nation at War with us: and if ours be safe there, they shall be safe in our Land.

L. [It shall be lawful for the Time to come, for any one to go out of our Kingdom, and return safely and securely by Land or by Water, saving his Allegiance to us; unless in time of War by some short Space for the common Benefit of the Kingdom, except Prisoners and Out-laws, (according to the Law of the Land) and People in War with us, and Merchants who shall be in such Condition as is above-mentioned.]

LI. If any Man holds of any Escheat, as of the Honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Bologna, Lancaster, or of other Escheats which are in our Hands, and are Baronies, and dies, his Heir shall not give any other Relief, or perform any other Service to us than he would to the Baron, if the Barony were in possession of the Baron; we will hold it after the same manner the Baron held it (c).

LII. [Those Men who dwell without the Forest, from henceforth shall not come before our Justiciaries of the Forest upon Summons, but such as are impleaded, or are Plodgers for any that were attached for something concerning the Forest] (d).

LIII. We will not make any Justiciaries, Constables, Sheriffs, or Bailiffs, but what are knowing in the Law of the Realm, and are disposed duly to observe it.

LIV. All Barons, who are Founders of Abbies, and have Charters of the Kings of England for the Advowson, or are entitled to it by ancient Tenure, may have the custody of them, when void, as they ought to have.

LV. All Woods that have been taken into the Forests (e), in our own time, shall forthwith be laid out again (f), and the like shall be done with the Rivers that have been taken or fenced in by us, during our Reign.

LVI. All evil Customs concerning Forests, Warrens, and Foresters, Warreners, Sheriffs, and their Officers, Rivers and their Keepers, shall forthwith be enquired into

(a) [Of his Free-hold or Liberties, or Free-Customs.]

(c) [Nor will we by reason of such Barony or Escheat, have any Escheat or Wardship of any of our Men, unless he that held the Barony or Escheat, held of us in Chief elsewhere.]

(d) 59. [No County-Court for the future shall be holden, but from Month to Month; and where there used to be a greater Interval, let it be so continued. 60. Neither any Sheriff, nor his Bailiff, shall keep his Turn in the Hundred oftener than twice in a Year, and only in the accustomed Place; that is, once after Easter, and once after Michaelmas; and the view of Frank-Pledge shall be held after Michaelmas, without occasion (3), and so that every one shall have his Liberties, which he had and was wont to have in the time of King Henry our Grandfather, or such as he obtained afterwards. 61. But the view of Frank-Pledge shall be so made, that our Peace may be kept, and that the Tying be full, as it was wont to be. 62. And the Sheriffs shall not seek occasions (4), but shall be content with what the Sheriff was wont to have for making his View in the Time of King Henry our Grandfather. 63. For the Time to come it shall not be lawful for any Man to give his Land to a Religious House, so as to take it again, and hold it of that House. 64. Nor shall it be lawful for any Religious House to receive Land, so as to grant it to him again of whom they received it, to hold of him. If any Man for the future shall so give his Land to a Religious House, and be convicted thereof, his Gift shall be void, and the Land shall be forfeited to the Lord of the Fee (5). 65. Scutage for the future shall not be taken as it was used to be taken in the Time of King Henry our Grandfather; [and that the Sheriff shall oppress no Man, but be content with what he was wont to have.] 66. Saving to the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Templars, Hospitallers, Earls, Barons, Knights, and all others, as well Ecclesiasticks as Seculars, the Liberties and free Customs which they had before: These being Witnesses, &c.

(2) By some ancient Laws of England, foreign Merchants were forbid coming into the Kingdom, except in Fair Times, and then were not to stay above forty Days. See Brady, p. 47.

(3) See Brady, p. 47. without Oppression, Dr. Brady.

(4) Occasions, Causes to seek any Man, Dr. Brady.

(5) The Restoring of these two Articles were, because by holding their Lands of the Church, the Service due from the Fees, which were intended for the Defence of the Realm were unduly withdrawn; and because the chief Lord lost the Advowson, Rents, and the like. Abundance of wars were used to evince the Force of this Law. But an ecclesiastical Stop was put to them at last by the statute of Mortmain, 7 Edw. II.

inquirantur in quolibet Comitatu per duodecim Milites juratos de eodem Comitatu, qui debent eligi per probos homines ejusdem Comitatus, & infra quadraginta dies post inquisitionem factam, penitus, ita quod nunquam revocentur, deleantur. o—

LVII. Omnes obfides & cartas statim reddemus que liberate fuerunt nobis ab Anglicis in securitatem pacis, vel fidelis servitii.

LVIII. Nos amovebimus penitus de balliviis parentes Gerardi de Athyes, quod de cetero nullam habeant balliviam in Anglia; Engclardum de Cygony, Andream, Petrum, & Gyonem, de Cancell. Gyonem de Cygony, Galfridum de Martyni, & fratres ejus, Philippum Markum, & fratres ejus, & Galfridum nepotem ejus, & totam sequelam eorundem.

LIX. Et statim post pacis reformationem, amovebimus de regno, omnes alienigenas Milites, Balistarios, servientes stipendiarios, qui venerint cum equis & armis ad nocumentum regni.

LX. Si quis fuerit discessitus, vel elongatus per nos, sine legali judicio parium suorum, de terris, castallis, libertatibus, vel jure suo, statim ea ei restituemus; & si contentio super hoc orta fuerit, tunc inde fiat per judicium viginti quinque Baronum, de quibus fit mentio inferius in securitate pacis.

LXI. De omnibus autem illis de quibus aliquis discessitus fuerit, vel elongatus, sine legali judicio parium suorum per Henricum regem patrem nostrum, vel per Ricardum regem fratrem nostrum, que in manu nostra habemus, vel que ali tenent, que nos oporteat warrantizare, respectum habebimus usque ad communem terminum cruce-signatorum. Exceptis illis de quibus placitum motum fuit, vel inquisitio facta per preceptum nostrum, ante susceptionem crucis nostre; cum autem redierimus de peregrinatione nostra, vel si forte remanserimus a peregrinatione nostra statim inde plenam justiciam exhibebimus.

LXII. Eundem autem respectum habebimus; —o de forestis deafforelandis, quas Henricus pater noster vel Ricardus frater noster afforellaverunt, & de custodiis terrarum que sunt de alieno feodo, cujusmodi custodias hucusque habuimus, occasione feodi quod aliquis de nobis tenuit per servitium militare, & de Abbatibus que fundate fuerint in feodo alterius quam nostro, in quibus dominus feodi dixerit se jus habere; & cum redierimus, vel si remanserimus a peregrinatione nostra, super hiis conquerentibus plenam justiciam statim exhibebimus.

LXIV. Omnes fines, qui injuste & contra legem terre facti sunt nobiscum, & omnia amerciamenta facta injuste & contra legem terre, omnino amerciamenta, vel fiat inde per judicium viginti quinque Baronum de quibus fit mentio inferius in securitate pacis, vel per judicium majoris partis eorundem, una cum predicto Stephano Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo, si interesse poterit, & aliis quos secum ad hoc vocare voluerit; & si interesse non poterit, nichilominus procedat negotium sine eo. Ita quod, si aliquis vel aliqui, de predictis viginti quinque Baronibus, fuerint in simili querela, amoveantur, quantum ad hoc judicium, & alii loco illorum per residuos de eisdem viginti quinque tantum ad hoc faciendum electi, & jurati substituantur.

LXV. Si nos discessimus, vel elongavimus Walenses de terris, vel libertatibus, vel rebus aliis, sine legali judicio parium suorum, eis statim redduntur; & si contentio super hoc orta fuerit, tunc inde fiat in Marchia per judicium parium suorum, de tenementis Anglie, secundum legem Anglie, de tenementis Wallie, secundum legem Wallie, de tenementis Marchie, secundum legem Marchie: idem facient Walenses nobis & nostris.

LXVI. De

(a) 54. [No Freeman for the future shall give or sell any more of his Land, but so that out of the Residue, the Service due to the Lord of the Fee may be sufficiently performed.]

(1) Their Names, according to M. Paris, were the Earls of Clare, Almonbury, Gloucester, Winchester, Hereford, Earl Roger, Earl Robert, Earl Marcellus Junior, Robert Fitz-Walter Senior, Gilbert de Clare, Bayliff de Plesci, Hugh Bigod, William de Munbray, the Mayor of London, Gilbert de Laval, Robert de Ros, the Constable of Chester, Richard de Percy, John Fitz-Robert, William Mautel, Geoffrey de Say, Roger de Munbray, William de Bluntingsfield, Richard de Bluntingsfield, William de Almyng, &c. 206.

into in each County, by twelve Knights of the same Shire chosen by the most creditable Persons in the same County, and upon Oath; and, within forty days after the said Inquest, be utterly abolished, so as never to be restored (a).

LVII. We will immediately give up all Hostages and Engagements, delivered unto us by our English Subjects, as Securities for their keeping the Peace, and yielding us faithful Service.

LVIII. We will entirely remove from our Bailiwicks the Relations of Gerard de Athyes, so as that for the future they shall have no Bailiwick in England. We will also remove Engclard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter and Gyon de Cancell, Gyon de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martyn and his Brothers, Philip Mark, and his Brothers, and his Nephew Geoffrey, and their whole Retinue.

LIX. And as soon as Peace is restored, we will send out of the Kingdom all foreign Soldiers, Crossbowmen, and Stipendiaries, who are come with Horses and Arms, to the Injury of our People.

LX. If any one hath been dispossessed, or deprived of us without the legal Judgment of his Peers, of his Lands, Castles, Liberties or Right, we will forthwith restore them to him; and if any dispute arises upon this head, let the matter be decided by the five and twenty Barons hereafter mentioned (1), for the preservation of the Peace.

LXI. As for all those things, of which any Person has, without the legal Judgment of his Peers, been dispossessed or deprived, either by King Henry our Father, or our Brother King Richard, and which we have in our hands, or are possessed by others, and we are bound to warrant and make good, we shall have a respite, till the Term usually allowed the Croises; excepting those things about which there is a Suit depending, or whereof an Inquest hath been made by our order, before we undertook the Crusade. But when we return from our Pilgrimage, or if we do not perform it, we will immediately cause full Justice to be administered therein.

LXII. The same respite we shall have for disafforesting the Forests, which Henry our Father, or our Brother Richard have afforested; and for the wardship of the Lands which are in another's Fee, in the same manner as we have hitherto enjoyed those Wardships, by reason of a Fee held of us by Knight's Service; and for the Abbeys founded in any other Fee than our own, in which the Lord of the Fee claims a Right: And when we return from our Pilgrimage, or if we should not perform it, we will immediately do full Justice to all the Complainants in this behalf.

LXIII. No Man shall be taken or imprisoned, upon the Appeal of a Woman, for the Death of any other Man than her Husband.

LXIV. All unjust and illegal Fines, and all Amerciaments imposed unjustly, and contrary to the Law of the Land, shall be entirely forgiven or else be left to the decision of the five and twenty Barons hereafter mentioned for the preservation of the Peace, or of the major part of them, together with the foresaid Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he shall think fit to take along with him: And if he cannot be present, the Business shall notwithstanding go on without him. But so that, if one or more of the foresaid five and twenty Barons be Plaintiffs in the same cause, they shall be set aside, as to what concerns this particular Affair; and others be chosen in their room out of the said five and twenty, and sworn by the rest to decide that matter.

LXV. If we have disced or dispossessed the Welsh of any Lands, Liberties, or other things, without the legal Judgment of their Peers, they shall immediately be restored to them: And if any Dispute arises upon this head, the matter shall be determined in the Marches, by the Judgment of their Peers: For Tenements in England according to the Law of England: For Tenements in Wales according to the Law of Wales: The same shall the Welsh do to us and our Subjects.

LXVI. As

LXVI. De omnibus autem illis de quibus aliquis Waleſium diffaiſus fuerit, vel elongatus, ſine legali iudicio parium ſuorum, & per Henricum regem patrem noſtrum vel Ricardum regem fratrem noſtrum, que nos in manu noſtra habemus, vel que alii tenent, que nos oporteat warrantizare, reſpectum habebimus uſque ad communem terminum cruce-signatorum: illis exceptis de quibus placitum motum fuit vel inſcriptio facta per preceptum noſtrum, ante ſuſceptionem crucis noſtre; cum autem redierimus, vel ſi forte remanſerimus a peregrinatione noſtra, ſtatim eis inde plenam juſticiam exhibebimus, ſecundum leges Waleſium, & partes predictas.

LXVII. Nos reddemus filium Lewelini ſtatim, & omnes obſides de Wallia, & cartas que nobis liberate fuerunt in ſecuritatem pacis.

LXVIII. Nos faciemus Alexandro Regi Scottorum, de fororibus ſuis & obſidibus reddendis, & libertatibus ſuis, & jure ſuo, ſecundum formam in qua faciemus aliis baronibus noſtris Anglie, niſi aliter eſſe debeat per cartas quas habemus de Wilhelmo patre ipſius, quondam rege Scottorum; & hoc erit per iudicium parium ſuorum in curia noſtra.

LXIX. Omnes autem iſtas conſuetudines predictas, & libertates quas nos conceſſimus in regno noſtro tenendas, quantum ad nos pertinet erga noſtros omnes de regno noſtro, tam clerici quam laici obſervent, quantum ad ſe pertinet erga ſuos.

LXX. Cum autem pro Deo, & ad emendationem regni noſtri, & ad melius ſopendam diſcordiam inter nos & barones noſtros ortam, hec omnia predicta conceſſimus, volentes ea integra & firma ſtabilitate gaudere: facimus & concedimus eis ſecuritatem ſubſcriptam; videlicet quod barones eligant viginti quinque barones de regno, quos voluerint, qui debeant pro totis viribus ſuis, obſervare, tenere, & facere obſervari, pacem & libertates quas eis conceſſimus, & hac preſenti carta noſtra confirmavimus. Ita ſcilicet quod ſi nos, vel juſticiarius noſter, vel Ballivi noſtri, vel aliquis de Miniſtris noſtris, in aliquo erga aliquem deliquerimus, vel aliquem articulum pacis aut ſecuritatis tranſgreſſi fuerimus, & delictum offenſum fuerit quatuor baronibus de predictis viginti quinque baronibus, illi quatuor barones accedant ad nos, vel ad juſticiarium noſtrum ſi fuerint extra regnum, propoſcentes nobis exceſſum, petent, ut exceſſum illum ſine dilatione faciamus emendari: & ſi nos exceſſum non emendaverimus, vel ſi fuerimus extra regnum juſticiarius noſter non emendaverit, infra tempus quadraginta dierum, computandum a tempore quo monſtratum fuerit nobis, vel juſticiario noſtro, ſi extra regnum fuerimus, predicti quatuor Barones referant cauſam illam ad reſiduos de viginti quinque baronibus, & illi viginti quinque barones cum communia totius terre, diſtingent & gravabunt nos modis omnibus quibus poterunt, ſcilicet per captionem caſtrorum, terrarum, poſſeſſionum, & aliis modis quibus poterunt donec fuerit emendatum ſecundum arbitrium eorum; ſalva perſona noſtra, & Regine noſtre, & liberorum noſtrorum, & cum fuerit emendatum intendunt nobis ſicut prius fecerunt.

LXXI. Et quicumque voluerit de terra, juret, quod ad predicta omnia exequenda parebit mandatis predictorum viginti quinque baronum, & quod gravabit nos pro poſſe ſuo cum ipſis; & nos publice & libere damus licentiam jurandi cuilibet qui jurare voluerit, & nulli unquam jurare prohibebimus.

LXXII. Omnes autem illos de terra qui per ſe & ſponte ſua voluerint jurare viginti quinque baronibus de diſtingendo & gravando nos cum eis, faciemus jurare eoſdem de mandato noſtro, ſicut predictum eſt.

LXXIII. Et ſi aliquis de viginti quinque baronibus deſecerit, vel a terra reſecerit, vel aliquo alio modo impeditus fuerit, quo minus iſta predicta poſſent exequi, qui reſidui fuerint de predictis viginti quinque baronibus, eligant alium loco ipſius, pro arbitrio ſuo, qui ſimili modo erit juratus quo & ceteri.

LXXIV. In

LXVI. As for all thoſe things, of which any Waleſian hath, without the legal Judgment of his Peers, been diſſeized or deprived, by King Henry our Father, or our Brother King Richard, and which we either have in our Hands, or others are poſſeſſed of, and we are obliged to warrant it; we ſhall have a reſpite till the time generally allowed the Croiſes: Excepting thoſe things about which a Suit is depending, or whereof an Inqueſt has been made by our Order, before we undertook the Cruſade. But when we return, or if we ſtay at home and do not perform our Pilgrimage, we will immediately do them full Juſtice according to the Laws of the Waleſh, and of the Parts afore-mentioned.

LXVII. We will without delay diſmiſs the Son of Lewelin, and all the Waleſh Hoſtages, and releaſe them from the Engagements they entered into with us for the preſervation of the Peace.

LXVIII. We ſhall treat with Alexander King of Scots, concerning the reſtoring of his Siſters and Hoſtages, and his Right and Liberties, in the ſame ſort and Manner as we ſhall do to the reſt of our Barons of England; unleſs by the Engagements which his Father William late King of Scots hath entered into with us it ought to be otherwiſe; and this ſhall be left to the Determination of his Peers in our Court.

LXIX. All the aforeſaid Cuſtoms and Liberties which we have granted, to be holden in our Kingdom, as much as it belongs to us towards our People; all our Subjects, as well Clergy as Laity, ſhall obſerve as far as they are concerned, towards their Dependents.

LXX. And, whereas for the Honour of God, and the Amendment of our Kingdom, and for quieting the Diſcord that has ariſen between us and our Barons, we have granted all the things aforeſaid; willing to render them firm and laſting, we do give and grant our Subjects the following Security; namely, that the Barons may chuſe five and twenty Barons of the Kingdom, whom they think convenient, who ſhall take care, with all their might, to hold and obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, the Peace and Liberties we have granted them, and by this our preſent Charter confirmed. So as that, if we, our Juſtiſary, our Balliſts, or any of our Officers, ſhall in any caſe fail in the performance of them, towards any Perſon; or ſhall break through any of theſe Articles of Peace and Security, and the Offence is notified to four Barons, choſen out of the five and twenty aforeſaid, the ſaid four Barons ſhall repair to us, or our Juſtiſary if we are out of the Realm, and laying open the Grievance, ſhall petition to have it redreſſed without delay; and if it is not redreſſed by us, or if we ſhould chance to be out of the Realm, if it is not redreſſed by our Juſtiſary within forty Days, reckoning from the time it has been notified to us, or to our Juſtiſary if we ſhould be out of the Realm; the four Barons aforeſaid ſhall lay the Cauſe before the reſt of the five and twenty Barons; and the ſaid five and twenty Barons, together with the Community of the whole Kingdom, ſhall diſtrain and diſtreſs us all the ways poſſible; namely, by ſeizing our Caſtles, Lands, Poſſeſſions, and in any other manner they can, till the Grievance is redreſſed according to their Pleaſure, ſaving harmleſs our own Perſon, and the Perſon of our Queen and Children; and when it is redreſſed, they ſhall obey us as before.

LXXI. And any Perſon whatſoever in the Kingdom may ſwear, that he will obey the Orders of the five and twenty Barons aforeſaid, in the Execution of the Premiſſes, and that he will diſtreſs us, jointly with them, to the utmoſt of his Power; and we give publick and free Liberty to any one that will ſwear to them, and never ſhall hinder any Perſon from taking the ſame Oath.

LXXII. As for all thoſe of our Subjects, who will not, of their own accord, ſwear to join the five and twenty Barons, in diſtreſſing us, and diſtreſſing us, we will iſſue our Order to make them take the ſame Oath, as aforeſaid.

LXXIII. And if any one of the five and twenty Barons dies, or goes out of the Kingdom, or is hindered any other way, from putting the things aforeſaid in Execution, the reſt of the ſaid five and twenty Barons may chuſe another in his room, at their diſcretion, who ſhall be ſworn in like manner, as the reſt.

LXXIV. In

LXXIV. In omnibus autem, que istis viginti quinque baronibus committuntur exequenda, si forte ipsi viginti quinque presentes fuerint, & inter se super re aliqua discordaverint, vel aliqui ex eis summoniti, nolint, vel nequeant interesse, ratum habeatur & firmum, quod major pars eorum qui presentes fuerint providerit, vel preceperit, ac si omnes viginti quinque in hoc consentissent, & predicti viginti quinque jurent quod omnia antedicta fideliter observabunt & pro toto posse suo facient observari.

LXXV. Et nos nichil impetramus ab aliquo, per nos, nec per alium, per quod aliqua istarum concessionum & libertatum revocetur vel minuat, & si aliquod tale impetratum fuerit irritum sit & inane; & numquam eo utemur per nos, nec per alium.

LXXVI. Et omnes malas voluntates, indignationes, & rancores ortos inter nos & homines nostros, clericos & laicos, a tempore discordie, plene omnibus remisimus, & condonavimus. Preterea, omnes transgressiones factas occasione ejusdem discordie, a pascha anno regni nostri sextodecimo, usque ad pacem reformatam, plene remisimus omnibus clericis & laicis, & quantum ad nos pertinet plene condonavimus.

LXXVII. Et insuper, fecimus eis fieri litteras testimoniales patentes domini Stephani Cantuariensis archiepiscopi, domini Henrici Dublinensis archiepiscopi, & episcoporum predictorum, & magistris Pandulphi, super securitate ista, & concessionibus prefatis.

LXXVIII. Quare volumus & firmiter precipimus, quod Anglicana ecclesia libera sit, & quod homines in regno nostro habeant, & teneant, omnes prefatas libertates, jura, & concessionibus, bene, & in pace, libere, & quiete, plene, & integre, sibi & heredibus suis, de nobis & heredibus nostris in omnibus rebus & locis in perpetuum, sicut predictum est.

LXXIX. Juratum est autem tam ex parte nostra, quam ex parte baronum, quod hec omnia supradicta, bona fide, & sine malo ingenio observabuntur.

Testibus supradictis, & multis aliis. Data per manum nostram in prato quod vocatur Runingmede inter Windelesfor. & Stanes quinto decimo die junii anno regni nostri septimo decimo.

o--- Deleantur per eosdem ita quod nos hoc sciamus prius vel Justiciarius noster si in Anglia non fuerimus.

By DAVID CASSLEY, Deputy-Librarian.

There are two Copies of this Charter in the Cotton-Library, which are as old as the Time of King John. One has still the Broad-Seal, though some of it was melted by the Flames, which on October 23, 1731, consumed part of the aforesaid Library, and which also made a few Letters of the Charter not legible: But they were supplied out of the other by the learned Mr. David Cassley, from whose Copy this is printed; and are distinguished above by Black Letters. Both Charters were visibly writ by the same Hand. That which hath no Seal, has two Slits at the bottom, from which, without question, hung two Seals.---The few Words printed here at the end, are placed so in the Original, and referred to by the same Marks.

LXXIV. In all things that are committed to the Charge of these five and twenty Barons, if, when they are all assembled together, they should happen to disagree about any matter; or some of them, when summoned, will not, or cannot come, whatever is agreed upon, or enjoyed by the major part of those who are present, shall be reputed as firm and valid, as if all the five and twenty had given their Consent, and the foresaid five and twenty shall swear, that all the Premises they shall faithfully observe, and cause with all their Power to be observed.

LXXV. And we will not, by ourselves, or others, procure any thing, whereby any of these Concessions and Liberties be revoked, or lessened; and if any such thing be obtained, let it be null and void; neither shall we ever make use of it, either by ourselves, or any other.

LXXVI. And all the Ill-will, Anger, and Malice, that hath arisen between us and our Subjects, of the Clergy and Laity, from the first breaking out of the Disension between us, we do fully remit, and forgive. Moreover all Trespasses occasioned by the said Disension, from Easter in the sixteenth Year of our Reign, till the Restoration of Peace and Tranquillity, we hereby entirely remit to all, Clergy as well as Laity, and as far as in us lies, do fully forgive.

LXXVII. We have moreover granted them our Letters Patents, testimonial of Stephen Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Lord Archbishop of Dublin, and the Bishops aforesaid, as also of Master Pandulph, for the Security and Concessions aforesaid.

LXXVIII. Wherefore we will and firmly enjoin, that the Church of England be free, and that all Men in our Kingdom, have and hold, all the foresaid Liberties, Rights, and Concessions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, to themselves and their Heirs, of Us and our Heirs, in all Things and Places for ever, as is aforesaid.

LXXIX. It is also sworn, as well on our part, as on the part of the Barons, that all the Things aforesaid shall faithfully and sincerely be observed.

Given under our hand, in the Presence of the Witnesses above-named, and many others, in the Meadow called Runingmede, between Windelesfor and Stanes, the 15th Day of June, in the 17th Year of our Reign.

o--- So as we are first acquainted therewith, or our Justiciary, if we should not be in England.

---o And in the same manner, about administering Justice, deaforesting the Forests, or letting them continue.

1215 (2).

JOHANNES Dei gratia, rex Angliæ, &c. Sciatis quod intuitu Dei & pro salute animæ nostræ & animarum antecessorum & successorum, ad exaltationem sanctæ ecclesiæ, & emendationem regni nostri; spontanea & bona voluntate nostra dedimus, & concessimus pro nobis & heredibus nostris, has libertates subscriptas, habendas & tenendas in regno nostro Angliæ in perpetuum.

I. In primis omnes forestæ quas rex Henricus avus noster afforestavit, videantur per probos & legales homines; & si boscum aliquem alium quam suum dominicum, afforestaverit ad dampnum illius cujus boscus fuerit, statim deafforestetur. Et si boscum suum proprium afforestaverit, remaneat foresta, salva communia de herbagio & rebus aliis in eadem foresta, illis qui eam prius habere consueverunt.

II. Homines qui manent extra forestam, non veniant de cætero coram iudiciariis nostris de foresta, per communes submonitiones; nisi sint in placito, vel plegii alicujus vel aliquorum qui attachiati sunt propter forestam: omnes autem bosci qui fuerint afforestati per regem Richardum fratrem nostrum, statim deafforestentur; nisi fuerint dominici bosci nostri.

III. Archiepiscopi, episcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, & libere tenentes, qui boscos habent in foresta, habeant boscos suos sicut eos habuerunt tempore primæ coronationis predicti regis Henrici avi nostri; ita quod quieti sint in perpetuum de omnibus purpresturis, vastis & affariis factis in illis boscis post illud tempus, usque ad principium secundi anni coronationis nostræ. Et qui de cætero vastum, purpresturam, vel affarium facient sine licentia nostra in illis boscis, de vastis, purpresturis, & affariis respondeant.

IV. Regardatores nostri eant per forestas, ad faciendum regardum, sicut fieri consuevit tempore primæ coronationis predicti regis Henrici avi nostri, & non aliter.

V. Inquisitio vel visus de expeditione canum existentium in foresta de cætero fiat, quando fieri debet regardum; scilicet de tertio anno in tertium annum; & tunc fiat per visum & testimonium legalium hominum, & non aliter. Et ille cujus canis inventus fuerit tunc non expeditus, pro misericordia det tres solidos; & de cætero nullus bos capiat pro expeditione. Talis autem expeditio fit per assensum communiter, quod tres ortelli ascendantur de pede anteriori fine poleta. Non expeditentur canes de cætero, nisi in locis ubi expeditarii solent tempore primæ coronationis predicti Henrici regis avi nostri.

VI. Nullus forestarius vel bedellus, faciat de cætero fœcaltum, vel colligat garbas, vel avenam, vel bladum aliud, vel agnos, vel porcellos, nec aliquam collectam faciat; & per visum & sacramentum duodecim regardatorum, quando facient regardum, tot forestarii ponantur ad forestas custodiendas

JOHN, by the Grace of God, King of England, &c. Know ye, that for the Honour of God, and the Health of our Soul, and the Souls of our Ancestors and Successors, and for the Exaltation of Holy Church, and for the Reformation of our Kingdom, We have of our free and good Will given and granted for Us and our Heirs, these Liberties hereafter specified, to be had and observed in our Kingdom of England for ever.

I. Imprimis, All the Forests made by our Grandfather King Henry, shall be viewed by honest and lawful Men; and if he turned any other than his own proper Woods into Forests, to the Damage of him whose Wood it was, it shall forthwith be laid out again and disforested. And if he turned his own Woods into Forest, they shall remain so, saving the Common of Pasture to such as were formerly wont to have it.

II. It is the LIV and LV of the Great Charter put into one Chapter.

III. The Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Knights, and Free-Tenants, who have Woods in any Forests, shall have their Woods as they had them at the time of the first Coronation of our Grandfather King Henry, so as they shall be discharged for ever of all Purprestures (3), Wastes and Affairs (4), made in those Woods, after that time, to the beginning of the second Year of our Coronation; and those who for the time to come shall make Waste, Purpresture or Affair in those Woods without our Licence, shall answer for them (5).

IV. Our Inspectors or Viewers shall go through the Forests to make a View, as it was wont to be at the time of the first Coronation of our said Grandfather King Henry, and not otherwise.

V. The Inquisition or View for Lawing (6) of Dogs which are kept within the Forest, for the future shall be when the View is made, that is, every three Years, and then shall be done by the View and Testimony of lawful Men, and not otherwise; and he whose Dogs at such time shall be found unlawed, shall be punished three Shillings; and for the future, no one shall be taken for Lawing, and such Lawing shall be according to the common Assize; namely, the three Claws of the Dog's Forefoot shall be cut off, or the Ball of the Foot taken out. And from henceforward Dogs shall not be lawed unless in such Places where they were wont to be lawed in the time of King Henry our Grandfather.

VI. No Forester or Bedel (7) for the future, shall make any Ale-Shots, (8) or collect Sheafs of Corn, or Oats, or other Grain, or Lambs, or Pigs; nor shall make any gathering whatsoever, but by the View and Oath of twelve Inspectors; and when they make their View,

(1) The Forests belonged originally to the Crown, and the Kings had granted several parts and parcels to private Men, who had grubbed them up and made them Arable or Pasture. But yet all that was thus grubbed was still called Forest. These Forests belonging to the King as his own Demains, or as the Sovereign L-ty, were a continual Source of vexatious Suits, as well against those which held them of the King, as against the neighbouring Freeman, under pretence of the Rights of the Crown.

(2) As it is to be found in Matthew Paris p. 250.

(3) i. e. Encroachment upon the King's Land.

(4) i. e. Grubbing up Woods, and making it Arable, without Licence.

(5) Every Article of this Charter is a clear Evidence how much the Subject was oppressed under pretence of preserving the Royal Forests.

(6) Cutting off their Claws, &c.

(7) Bailiff of the Forest.

VII. Nullum suanimotum de cætero teneatur in regno nostro, nisi ter in anno; videlicet in principio quindécim dierum ante festum sancti Michaelis, quando agitatores veniunt ad agistandum dominicos boscos, & circa festum sancti Martini quando agitatores nostri debent accipere panagium suum. Et ad ista duo Suanimota, convenient forestarii, viridarii, & agitatores; & nullus alius per districtionem. Et tertium suanimotum teneatur in initio XV dierum ante festum sancti Johannis Baptiste pro fœnatione bestiarum nostrarum; & ad istum suanimotum convenient forestarii, viridarii, & non alii per districtionem.

VIII. Et præterea singulis quadraginta diebus, per totum annum convenient viridarii & forestarii ad videndum attachmenta de forestata de viridi quam de venatione, per præsentationem ipsorum forestariorum, & coram ipsis attachentur: predicta autem suanimota non teneantur, nisi in comitatibus in quibus teneri consueverunt.

IX. Unusquisque liber homo agitet boscum suum in foresta pro voluntate sua, & habeat panagium suum.

X. Concedimus etiam quod unusquisque liber homo possit ducere porcos suos per dominicum boscum nostrum, libere & sine impedimento; & ad agistandum eos in boscis suis propriis, vel alibi ubi voluerit. Et si porci aliquis liberi hominis una nocte pernoctaverint in foresta nostra, non inde occasione, ita quod aliquid de suo perdat.

XI. Nullus de cætero amittat vitam vel membra pro venatione nostra; sed si aliquis captus fuerit & convictus de capcione venationis, graviter redimatur, si habeat unde redimi possit, & si non unde redimi possit, jaceat in prisona nostra per annum unum & unum diem. Et si post annum unum & unum diem plagis invenire possit, exeat a prisona; sin autem, abijcet regnum nostrum Anglie.

XII. Quicumque archiepiscopus, episcopus, comes vel baro veniens ad nos per mandatum nostrum, transierit per forestam nostram, licet illi capere unam vel duas bestias per visum forestarii si presens fuerit; sin autem, faciat cornari, ne videatur hoc furtive facere: ita licet in redeundo idem eis facere, sicut predictum est.

XIII. Unusquisque liber homo de cætero sine occasione, faciat in bosco suo vel in terra sua, quam habeat in foresta molendinum, vivarium, stagnum, marleram, fossatum vel terram arabilem, extra coeptum in terra arabili, ita quod non fit ad nocumentum aliquis vicini.

XIV. Unusquisque liber homo habeat in boscis suis arias accipitrum, spervanorum, falconum, aquilarum & heironum; & habeant famuliter mel quod inventum fuerit in boscis suis.

XV. Nullus forestarius de cætero, qui non fit forestarius de feudo, reddens firmam nobis pro balliva sua, capiat Cheminagium, scilicet pro caretta per dimidium annum, duos denarios, & per alium dimidium duos denarios; & pro equo, qui portat summagium, per dimidium annum, unum obolum; & per alium dimidium annum, unum obolum; & non nisi de illis, qui extra ballivam suam tanquam mercatores veniunt, per licentiam suam in ballivam suam, ad buscum, meiremium, corticem, vel carbonem emendum, & alias ducendum ad vendendum ubi voluerint. Et de nulla caretta alia, vel summagio, aliquod cheminagium capitur; non capitur cheminagium, nisi in locis illis, ubi antiquitus capi solebat & debuit: illi autem qui portant super dorsum suum, buscum, corticem vel carbonem ad vendendum, quamvis inde vivant, nullum de cætero dent cheminagium de boscis aliorum; nullum detur cheminagium forestariis nostris præterquam de dominicis boscis nostris.

XVI. Omnes utlagati pro foresta a tempore regis Henrici avi nostri, usque ad primam coronationem nostram, veniant View, so many Foresters shall be appointed to keep the Forests as they shall reasonably think sufficient.

VII. No Swainmote for the time to come shall be holden in our Kingdom oftner than thrice a Year; that is to say, in the beginning of fifteen Days before Michaelmas, when the Agisters, come to agist the demesne Woods; and about the feast of St. Martin, when our Agisters are to receive their Pannage (1); and in those two Swainmotes, the Foresters, Verderers, and Agisters shall meet, and no other by Compulsion or Distress; and the third Swainmote shall be holden in the beginning of the fifteen Days before the Feast of St. John Baptist, concerning the Fawning of our Does; and at this Swainmote shall meet the Foresters and Verderers, and no others shall be compelled to be there.

VIII. And furthermore, every forty Days throughout the Year, the Verderers and Foresters shall meet to view the Attachments of the Forest, as well of Vert (2), as Venison, by Presentment of the Foresters themselves; and they who committed the Offences, shall be forced to appear before them: But the aforesaid Swainmotes shall be holden but in such Counties as they were wont to be holden.

IX. Every Freeman shall agist (3) his Wood in the Forest at his pleasure, and shall receive his Pannage.

X. We grant also, that every Freeman may drive his Hogs through our demesne Woods, freely and without Impediment, and may agist them in his own Woods, or elsewhere, as he will; and if the Hogs of any Freeman shall remain one Night in our Forests, he shall not be troubled, so as to lose any thing for it.

XI. No Man for the time to come shall lose Life or Limb for taking our Venison; but if any one be seized and convicted of taking Venison, he shall be grievously fined, if he hath wherewithal to pay; and if he hath not, he shall lie in our Prison a Year and a Day. And if after that time he can find Sureties, he shall be released; if not, he shall abjure our Realm of England.

XII. It shall be lawful for every Archbishop, Bishop, Earl, or Baron, coming to us by our Command, and passing through our Forest, to take one or two Deer by view of the Forester, if present, if not, he shall cause a Horn to be sounded, lest he should seem to steal them. Also in their return, it shall be lawful for them to do the same thing.

XIII. Every Freeman for the future may erect a Mill in his own Wood, or upon his own Land, which he hath in the Forest; or make a Warren, or Pond, a Marl-pit, or Ditch, or turn it into Arable, without the Covert in the Arable Land, so as it be not to the Detriment of his Neighbour.

XIV. Every Freeman may have in his Woods the Ayries of Hawks, of Spar-Hawks, Falcons, Eagles, and Merons; and they shall have likewise the Honey which shall be found in their Woods.

XV. No Forester for the future, who is not a Forester in Fee, paying us Rent for his Office, shall take Cheminage (4); that is to say, for every Cart Two-pence for half a Year, and for the other half Year Two-pence; and for a Horse that carries Burthens, for half a Year a Half-penny, and then only of those, who come as Buyers, out of their Bailiwick, to buy Underwood, Timber, Bark, or Charcoal, to carry it to sell in other places, where they will: And for the time to come there shall be no Cheminage taken for any other Cart or Carriage-Horse, unless in those places where anciently it was wont, and ought to be taken; but they who carry Wood, Bark, or Coal upon their Backs to sell, though they get their livelihood by it, shall for the future pay no Cheminage: But for Passage through the Woods of other Men, no Cheminage shall be given to our Foresters, but only in our own Woods.

XVI. All Persons outlawed for Offences committed in our Forests from the time of King Henry our Grandfather

(1) Money for the feeding of Hogs with Mast in the King's Forests.

(2) That is, the Offences that have been committed in cutting Wood, or killing Deer.

(3) That is, take in this Neighbour's Cattle to feed.

(4) Money for passing through the Forest.

XVII. Nullus castellanus vel alius teneat placitum de foresta five de viridi five de venatione; sed quilibet forestarius de feudo attachet placita de foresta, tam de viridi quam de venatione, & ea presentet viridaris provinciarum; & cum rotulato fuerint, & sub sigillis viridariorum inclusa, presententur capitali forestario cum in partes illas venerit ad tenendum placita forestar, & coram eo terminentur.

XVIII. Omnes autem consuetudines predictas & libertates, quas nos concessimus in regno tenendas, quantum ad nos pertinet erga nostros, omnes de regno nostro, tam haici quam clerici obervent, quantum ad se pertinet erga suos.

Grandfather, until our first Coronation, may reverse their Outlawries without Impediment, but shall find Pledges that for the future they will not forfeit to us (1) in our Forest.

XVII. No Castellan or other Person shall hold Pleas of the Forest, whether concerning Vert or Venison: But every Forester in Fee shall attach Pleas of the Forest (2), as well concerning Vert as Venison, and shall present the Pleas or Offences to the Verderers of the several Counties; and when they shall be enrolled and sealed under the Seals of the Verderers, they shall be presented to the chief Forester, when he shall come into those Parts, to hold Pleas of the Forest, and shall be determined before him.

XVIII. And all the Customs and Liberties aforesaid, which we have granted to be holden in our Kingdom; as much as belongs to us towards our Vassals, all of our Kingdom, as well Laicks as Clerks, shall observe as much as belongs to them towards their Vassals. (3)

HENRY III.
principal Events of his Reign.

WE are going to enter upon a long Reign embarras'd with divers Events, most of which have little Connection together. Were I to dwell upon every the least remarkable Thing occasioned by the long Administration of Henry III, I should, by my tediousness, be more apt to tire the Reader, than give him any clear knowledge of the Affairs of those days. I shall confine my self therefore to certain principal Heads, which are, as it were, the Substance of what happened during this Reign. First, I shall endeavour to represent the State of the Kingdom, the particular Genius of the King, and the Character, and pernicious Designs of his Ministers. Secondly, will be shewn the insatiable Avarice and Tyranny of the Court of Rome. Thirdly, the Barons League, to oppose the arbitrary and tyrannical Power intended to be introduced into the Kingdom. And lastly, the Barons Abuse of the Authority they usurped on that pretence, and the unfortunate Successes which rendered all their Proceedings ineffectual. These are the chief Heads we are going to run over as briefly as the great length of this Reign will permit, and to which almost whatever shall be afterwards said will refer.

King John left his Crown to his eldest Son. But the young Prince, who was but ten Years of Age (4), was very incapable of curing the Disorders of so distempered a State. A few Lords, who firmly adhered to the Service of the King his Father, and an Army of Foreigners, whom John himself never ventured to trust, formed very unlikely Instruments to restore the royal Family. There was the less room to hope for so favorable a Turn, as almost all the Peers of the Realm, supported with the Forces of France, appeared strictly united against the Family of the late King. Besides, Lewis's great Progress seem'd in some measure to promise him the Reduction of the whole Kingdom. In spite of these seemingly insurmountable Difficulties, young Henry found in the wise and brave Earl of Pembroke (5), a loyal Subject, and capable withal of projecting and executing the greatest Designs. Without being disheartened in this Extremity, the generous Earl undertook to raise the Hopes of the honest English, and drive the Foreigners out of the Kingdom.

His Speech to the Lords of the King's Party.
From Walsley,
p. 562.

As soon as John resigned his last Breath, the Earl of Pembroke assembled the Lords, who remained firm to that Prince, and presenting young Henry to them, made a Speech, beginning with these words: Behold our King. Then (after a short Pause) he represented to them, "Though the Conduct of the late King gave the confederate Barons a plausible Pretence to complain,

"it was not reasonable to take the Crown from a Family, that had worn it so long, much less to give it to a Foreigner. As King John's Faults were personal, it would be unjust to inflict a Punishment on his Son, whose tender Years rendered him blameless. He said further, The Remedy used by the confederate Barons was worse than the Disease, since it tended to reduce the Kingdom under a dishonourable Servitude. And therefore, in the present Posture of Affairs, nothing was able to deliver them from the impending Yoke, but their firm Union, under a Prince who was undeniably the lawful Heir to the Crown." This Speech met with Applause from the whole Assembly, who cried out with one Voice, We will have Henry for our King (6). Whereupon, though the Earl of Chester (7) made some opposition at first, however, he afterwards desisting, a Day was appointed for the Coronation. The Ceremony was performed with little Pomp, by the Bishops of Bath and Winchester, in the Presence of an inconsiderable Number of Lords (8) with Gallo the Legate, who espoused young Henry's Interest to the utmost of his Power. King John's Crown being lately lost in the Well-stream, as was related, they were forced to use a plain Circle, or Chaplet of Gold, because they had neither the Time nor Means to make a better. Before the Crown was set on his Head, the usual Oath was administered to him. Which done, the Legate, who had ever his Master's Interest in view, caused the young Prince to do Homage to the Holy See. It was not then proper to oppose this Homage, for fear of losing the Pope's Assistance, and increasing the Difficulties, Henry was, probably, to struggle with in the beginning of his Reign.

These Ceremonies being over, the Assembly of the Lords, who represented at that time the whole Nation, chose the Earl of Pembroke, Guardian of the King, and declared him Protector, that is, Regent of the Kingdom. They could not chuse to that High Office, a Person of greater Abilities, of more Zeal for the Public Good, or a faster Friend to the Royal Family. From the beginning of King John's Reign, for whom he partly procured the Crown by his Diligence and Address, he had always remained attach'd to the Service of that Prince, without ever deserting him in his greatest Distress. This constant Loyalty gaining him his Master's Favour and Confidence, he was always trusted with his Secrets, and therefore was better qualified than any other to be at the Helm in so tempestuous a Season. He perfectly knew the cause of the Troubles, and the Interests and Intrigues of those that excited them. He was not ignorant that most of the Barons were 1216. extremely dissatisfied with the Prince they had sent for, and upon that he chiefly built his hopes. The private Submissions of forty of them to the King, gave him room to believe, that Dissensions were rising among them, and that their Example would quickly be followed by the rest. Indeed nothing but a desire of Pardon prevented the Majority from deserting Prince Lewis. And therefore, the Regent believed he had reason to hope, that a Declaration of the new King's readiness to pardon, would soon dissolve the Confederacy. Besides, there was no likelihood, that after the Death of King John, so many Lords could refuse to continue in Obedience to a foreign Prince, who too gave them every Day fresh Occasions of Complaint. In this Expectation the Earl of Pembroke sent Letters to all the Barons and Corporations in the Kingdom (1), to inform them of Henry's Accession to the Crown, promising withal great Rewards to such as would return to their Duty (2). These Assurances, and the Regent's known Probity, shaking many of the confederate Barons, they began to think seriously of making them Peace with their lawful Sovereign. The Excommunication of Prince Lewis, published every Sunday, furnished them with a further, and no less powerful Motive to change. It was not possible but among all these Lords, there were tender Consciences, that were concerned at following the Banners of an excommunicated Prince. Much less could they bear to see themselves involved in the same Sentence, what endeavours soever were used to remove their Scruples. So that Lewis's Affairs began to decline, at the very time they seemed to be most prosperous. The raising the Siege of Dover contributed likewise very much to disconcert them. Prince Lewis frequently tried to corrupt Hubert de Burgh, Governor of that Place; but always found in that brave Man a Loyalty proof against all Temptations. Force had been till less available, for he was repulsed with loss in all his Assaults. The Death of King John happening during this Siege, Lewis loved the Governor would become more tractable. Accordingly he ordered him to be summoned afresh to surrender; representing to him withal, that since, by John's Death, he was released from his Oath, he might without scruple swear Fealty to a Prince, whom his Countrymen had owned for their Sovereign, and who would be glad to show him Marks of his Esteem. Hubert answered, the late King having left a Successor, to whom his Allegiance was due, he would maintain his Cause to the last drop of his Blood: Adding, he could never believe, the Esteem of any brave Prince could be gained by a notorious Bafeness. Promises proving ineffectual, Lewis threatened Hubert to put his Brother, who was in his power, to death. This Threat made no Impression on the faithful Governor, who continued to defend, with the same Resolution, the important Place committed to his Trust. Lewis finding he did but lose time before Dover, raised the Siege, and invested the Castle of Harford, which made but a faint Resistance (3). The taking of this Place, gave the English Lords fresh Cause of complaint. Robert Fitz-Walter, claiming the Custody of the Castle as belonging to him by ancient Right, had the Mortification to be denied, and see a French Governor placed there with Troops of the same Nation. This Injustice caused great Murmurs among the English Barons. They were extremely vexed to behold their own Inheritances given to Foreigners, without any regard to their Complaints. Their Discontent was further inflamed by the Indiscretion of some Frenchmen, who upbraided the English Barons for Traytors, declaring, it was not safe to trust them with the Custody of Castles. These Expressions, added to what the Viscount of Melun is reported to say, caused among the English, and especially among the Nobility, an universal Dissatisfaction, which Lewis perceived not as yet, but of which he soon felt the Effects. Mean while, continuing his Progress, he became Master of some other places before he returned to London, where he came not till towards the latter end of the Year.

Whilst Lewis was improving his Advantages, the Regent omitted nothing that might lead to the recovery of the just Rights of young Henry. His first, and as he thought, the most necessary Precaution in the present Juncture, was, to send speedy notice to the Pope of the Death of King John, and the Coronation of his Son; intreating him withal, to take into his Protection the young Prince, who was surrounded with foreign and domestic Enemies. Innocent took care not to be wanting in what concerned his own Interests. The Preservation of England, which he considered as the Patrimony of St. Peter, and even gave it that name, was in danger. Wherefore he sent fresh Powers to his Legate to renew the Excommunication of the Prince of France, and the confederate Barons. Lewis, to whom the Legate communicated his new Orders, solemnly protested against all that should be done to his Prejudice. Mean time, to prevent the new Confession from having any effect, he required all the English Lords to renew their Homage to him, on a Day appointed. His Protestation hindered not the Legate from executing the Pope's Orders. He held a Synod at Bristol, where he re-excommunicated Lewis with all the customary Formalities. He thereby furnished some of the Barons with a Pretence to refuse the Homage required by Lewis.

Christmas approaching, both Sides agreed upon a Truce during the Holidays. Lewis made use of that opportunity to hold a General Assembly at Oxford, whilst the Regent held another, though much less numerous, at Cambridge. The King's Party propounding that the Truce should be prolonged, Lewis at first refused to agree to it (4). But hearing soon after, that the Pope intended to confirm, in full Consistory, the Excommunication denounced by his Legate, caused him to consent to prolong the Truce till a Month after Easter. His design was to go to Paris, and consult the King his Father (5).

This Truce was very advantageous to the Earl of Pembroke. He wisely made use of it to reinforce his Army with new Levies, and to gain by secret Practices, some of the confederate Barons. On the contrary, it was extremely prejudicial to Lewis, whose Absence gave the Barons opportunity of taking Measures to free themselves from his Yoke, by returning to the Obedience of their lawful Sovereign (6). Several took that time to treat with the King. Among whom was William Marshal, eldest Son of the Earl of Pembroke, who till then had been one of the most zealous Partisans of France (7). The Cinque Ports declared likewise for Henry, and sent out a Fleet to oppose Lewis's Return. But though their Fleet fought the French, and destroyed several of their Ships, they could not hinder the Prince's landing at Sandwich. He was so exasperated at this bold attack, that he burnt the Town where he landed, as being one of the Cinque Ports.

Upon the Expiration of the Truce, the Regent sent the Earl of Chester (8) to besiege Mont-Sarl in Leicestershire, where was a French Garrison (9). The loss of this Place might have proved of great prejudice to Lewis, not so much on account of its Importance, as because, at such a juncture, it highly concerned him to hinder the King's Party, from appearing to be in condition to recover themselves. For this reason Lewis thought it necessary, at any rate, to raise the Siege. To do it effectually, he put the Earl of Perche (10) at the head of twenty thousand Men, with orders to march to the Enemy. Upon the approach of this Army, the Earl of Chester, who was not so strong, raised the Siege and returned to the Regent (11). But the French General was not satisfied with this Advantage. As he believed the Earl of Pembroke unable to withstand so great Forces, he formed the design of besieging Lincoln Castle, which held out for the King, though the City had

The Castle of Lincoln was of so great Importance, that the Regent could not resolve to lose it, without using his utmost Endeavours to relieve it. Whilst the French were battering the Castle with all possible Vigour, and the besieged making as brave a Defence, he assembled all his Forces with a Resolution to run all hazards to save that Place. He used such Expedition, that he advanced as far as Newark, within twelve Miles of Lincoln, before the Besiegers were determined, whether to expect him, or march and give him Battle. They had all along hoped to take the Castle, before he could draw his Army together. Surprized at the sudden Approach of the Enemy, the French General called a Council of War, to consult what was to be done on this occasion. Some were for meeting the Enemy, because if a Victory fortunately ensued, the Castle would immediately surrender. Adding, that by going out of the City, they might use their Cavalry, in which consisted their chief Strength, whereas they would be of no Service, if it was resolved to expect the Enemies within the Walls.

This Advice was the safest, but others were of a contrary Opinion. They affirmed, as the Castle was reduced to Extremities, it was better to keep within the City and continue the Siege; that it was easy to defend the Walls, till the Castle surrendered; after which the Earl of Pembroke would only think of retreating, or however, might always be fought. This Advice prevailing, all Things were prepared for the Defence of the City, whilst the Siege of the Castle was continued. Mean time, the English Army approaching without opposition, the Regent caused a Body of chosen Troops, commanded by Faulk de Brea, to enter the Castle at a Postern Gate, which opened into the Fields. It is strange, the Besiegers should never think of this Inconvenience. Faulk was no sooner entered, but, pursuant to the Measures taken with the Regent, he sallied out upon the Besiegers, whilst the King's Army followed one of the Gates of the City.

The French Army defeated at Lincoln. M. Paris. T. Wilkes. Henningford.

The Earl of Perche perceiving himself thus attacked from two different Quarters, exerted his utmost in his Defence. But his Troops not having room to fight, and besides, being deprived of the assistance of the Horse, were quickly put in Confusion. On the other side, the Royal Army, encouraged by the presence of the Regent, and the Indulgences liberally bestowed by the Legate upon all that should be slain in Battle, continued in a furious manner to storm the Gate. This Assault was so vigorous, that, notwithstanding the obstinate Resistance of the French, the King's Troops at length entered the City, whilst Faulk de Brea pressed the Enemy on the other side. The Earl of Perche perceiving all was lost, resolved not to survive the Shame of his Defeat. He was slain, upbraiding the English of his Party, for betraying him by their Counsels. After the death of the General, a dreadful Slaughter was made of the French Troops, who almost all perished on this occasion. The City of Lincoln, which had all along sided with the Barons, was abandoned to a general plunder, where the Soldiers found an inestimable Booty and therefore called it Lincoln Fair (2).

Lewis raises the Siege of Dover, and retreats to London. He demands Sixty Art of his Father. M. Paris. p. 297.

Whilst the Earl of Perche was employed in these Parts, Prince Lewis made a fresh Attempt upon Dover Castle, but meeting with no less resistance than before, made no great Progress in the Siege. The News of the Defeat at Lincoln, made him resolve to retire to London, and take new Measures. Upon his Arrival, his first care was to send to the King his Father for speedy Supplies, and answerable to his wants, without which he let him know there was no likelihood of retrieving his Affairs. Philip, willing to keep fair with the Pope, pretended he would not interpose any more in his Son's Concerns. He publicly sent him word, to take care of himself as he could. However, he ordered him to that Blanch his Daughter-in-law, in her own Name, quickly got ready a Body of Troops, with Ships to transport them into England. Had these Succours safely arrived, they might have repaired Lewis's Loss at Lincoln. But his Fortune was no better at Sea than at Land. The Commanders of the Fleet of the Cinque Ports, hearing the French Troops were to embark at Calais, laid wait for them in their Passage and giving them Battle, took and sunk the greatest part of the French Fleet (3).

These two successive Losses threw Lewis into great Straits, which were farther encreased by the Approach of the English Army. He had scarce received News of the Defeat of the Succours that were coming from France, when he saw himself besieged in London, or at least closely blocked up (4). So many misfortunes one after another, the Discontent of the English, which now shewed itself openly, the Pope's Thunders, which, upon the decline of his Affairs, began to inspire him with Terror, made him sensible it was time to think of retreating. He determined therefore to sue to the Regent for Peace. But, notwithstanding his ill Situation, he intimated to him, that he would consent to none but an honorable Peace, that should screen his English Adherents from all Prosecution. By the way, this Prince's generous care of the English Barons, is hardly reconcilable with the Resolution, imputed to him by the Viscount of Melun. The Earl of Pembroke immediately granted his Demand. He considered, the King of France was not so drained of Men and Money, but that he could still powerfully assist the Prince his Son. On the other hand, he was afraid the Barons would become great a Severity would involve the Kingdom in fresh Troubles. In short, he saw the using his Success with Moderation, would restore Peace to the Kingdom, and put the young King in quiet Possession of the Crown, which was the sole Aim of all his Desires. These Considerations induced him readily to agree to a Treaty of Peace (5) upon the following Terms:

That all Persons who had taken part with Lewis, since the beginning of the War, should be restored to all the Rights they enjoyed before the Troubles.

That the City of London should have her ancient Privileges.

That all the Prisoners taken since the first Arrival of Lewis into England, should be released. But as to those that were taken on either Side, before that time, Commissioners should be appointed, to enquire whether those of his Party were engaged with him, at the time of their being made Prisoners.

That the Ransoms already paid should not be returned, and that such as were become due should be punctually paid: But that nothing should be demanded of the Prisoners, whose Ransoms were not settled.

That all the English, of what Rank and Condition soever, Prisoners or others, who took up Arms against King John, should swear Fealty to King Henry.

That the Hostages given to Prince Lewis for the Payment of the Ransoms that were become due, should be released immediately, upon Payment of the Money.

That all the Places, Towns and Castles, in Lewis's possession, should be delivered to the King.

That the King of Scotland should be included in the Treaty, upon restoring all he had taken during the War, and that the King of England should make the like Restitution to him.

The same thing was stipulated in favour of the Prince of Wales.

That Lewis should cause all the Islands to be restored that were taken in his Name.

That he should renounce the Homages received from the Subjects of the King of England.

That whatever was due to him, and of which the Time of Payment was expired, should be punctually paid him.

That in the first Article, where Lewis's Adherents are mentioned, Ecclesiastics were not included, but with respect to the Lay-Fees they held before the War.

An Historian adds two Articles more, which are not found in the Treaty. First, That Lewis should use his utmost Endeavours to oblige his Father to restore whatever was taken from King John beyond Sea. Secondly, That in case he could not prevail, he himself should make this

(1) Gilbert de Gant had besieged it a long time in vain, and been vigorously repulsed in all his Assaults. He was made Earl of Lincoln by Lewis.

(2) One may guess at the great Riches of the Cathedral, which was pillaged, when Geoffrey de Dringburgh, the Precentor, complained that he had lost eleven thousand Marks for his own Share. M. Paris. p. 297. The Persons of Note taken in this Battle (which was fought on May 19) were: Earl of Winchester, Henry de Beaumont Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gant Earl of Lincoln, Commanders; and of the other Barons, Robert 1st Earl of Leicester, Richard de Moynier, William de Aumery, William de Beauchamp, William Maudslai, Oliver de Harcourt, Roger de Crisp, William de Cok, the Bishop of Rye, Robert de Rothe, Ralph Chenduit, &c. M. Paris. p. 296.

(3) This Sea-Engagement was about the twenty fourth of August. As the English had but forty, and the French eighty large Ships, the King's Fleet could not attack them in the Front, but tackling about, and getting to the Windward, they bore down upon them and made great slaughter of them with their Arrows; but what contributed most to their Victory, was their having great Quantities of dry st-Lime in Powder, which being cast into the Air, was blown by the Wind into the Frenchmen's Eyes and blinded them. The Commanders of the English Fleet were Philip de Albini and John Marshall. The French Admiral was one Eustace, who from a Monk turned Pirate, and at last was made Admiral of the French Fleet. M. Paris. p. 295.

1217. Refutation whenever he came to the Crown. Though these two Conditions were not inserted in the Treaty itself, it is very likely, they were stipulated in the secret Articles, since the French Historians do not scruple to own them. Besides, we shall see in the Sequel, that when Lewis came to the Crown, the Court of England called upon him to perform his Promise, and that St. Lewis his Son had very great Scruples on that account.

The Treaty being signed, and afterwards confirmed by the Authority of the Legate, the King and Prince Lewis swore to observe it, with the usual Formalities. After which, Lewis received Absolution from the Legate (1). Every Thing being thus concluded, the Prince set sail for France, after borrowing five thousand Marks (2) of the City of London to pay his Debts.

Immediately after the Prince's Departure, Henry made his Entry into London, where he was received with great Pomp, and Demonstrations of a universal Satisfaction. It was not without Reason that the People expressed so great Joy, since, notwithstanding the Advantages lately gained by the young King, he took a solemn Oath, to maintain the Nation in their Privileges. Thus by the prudent Management of the Regent, the vanquished Barons, obtained more solid Advantages, than they could have expected from a Victory, which would have subjected them, and perhaps beyond all Redress, to a foreign Power.

Of all Lewis's Party, the Ecclesiastics were the only Persons that had no reason to rejoice at the Peace, which left them to the Pope's Mercy, whom they had offended in the most sensible Part. He bore, with Impatience, the Contempt of his Confessors by Lewis and the Barons; but the Clergy's Disobedience made him still more outrageous. As soon as the Legate was at liberty to proceed against the Ecclesiastics, pursuant to the last Article of the Treaty, he ordered a strict Inquiry to be made throughout the Kingdom, after those who contemned the Interdict. All that were found guilty were suspended, or deprived of their Benefices, or constrained to repair their Fault by large Sums of Money (3). A remarkable Instance of the wide Difference between the Ecclesiastical and the Civil Power.

The King of Scotland, who was excommunicated for doing Homage to a foreign Prince, embraced the offer of being included in the Treaty. He came to Northampton, where he was absolved by the Legate, after doing Homage to Henry for the Fees he held in England. Then he delivered up Carlisle, which he had taken during the Troubles.

Pope Innocent III, dying this Year, Honorius III, was promoted to the Papal Chair (4).

It seemed that after the Departure of the French, England at length would enjoy some Repose, to which she had been so long a Stranger. But it was not possible that a perfect Calm should immediately succeed to violent a Storm. The Treaty with Lewis gave Birth to new Troubles, which threw the Regent into great Perplexities. Those Barons (5) that had faithfully served King John, and to whom were given the confiscated Estates of the Rebels, could not bear the thoughts of restoring them to the old Proprietors, according to the Tenor of the Treaty. On the other hand, the Ecclesiastics loudly complained of being abandoned to the Legate's Persecutions, without the least care being taken of their Concerns. However, the Regent was resolved, at any rate, to execute the Treaty, believing it to be the only means to root out all Disturbances. Pursuant to this Resolution, he marched with a good Body of Troops, to bring to reason such as forcibly withheld divers Castles and Lands from the former Owners.

Robert de Gaucy was the only one however that stood a Siege of eight Days, in the Castle of Newark (6), belonging to the Bishop of Lincoln. But at length, finding there was no hopes of Assistance, he surrendered the Castle to the Bishop, upon payment of one hundred Pounds Sterling. The rest that were in the same case, discouraged by this Example, made the like Compositions. The Regent executing the Treaty was so necessary for restoring Tranquillity to the Kingdom, that the Regent thought the Interests of a few private Persons, how faithfully soever they had served the King, ought not to be preferred to the general good, which would result from the punctual Performance of his word. Mean time, to establish the young King firmly in the Throne, it still remained to satisfy the Pope, who was not inclined to pardon the Ecclesiastics, that dared to despise the Interdict. In the beginning of a Reign, when the Fidelity of the Subjects was yet wavering, and the King a Minor, it would have been very imprudent in the Earl to exasperate the Court of Rome, by maintaining the Interests of the Clergy. On the contrary, it was but too likely, that the young King would need the Pope's Protection. For this reason, he readily published, at the Instance of the Legate, a Proclamation, commanding all the excommunicated Ecclesiastics that were absolved, to depart the Kingdom on pain of Imprisonment: This Severity caused them to make haste and satisfy the Legate, who only wanted their Money.

All the Troubles being thus happily appeased, the English impatiently expected the Performance of the King's Promises, with regard to their Liberties, the effectual Re-establishment whereof they had been made to hope. However zealous the Regent might be for the King's Service, he did not think proper to make him violate his Word. Wherefore, he sent express Orders (7), to all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, to see the two Charters of King John duly observed (8), and to punish without Mercy all Violators thereof. How happy would the English have been, if the Successors of this great Man in his Post and Credit with the King, had followed the same Maxims, and imbued with them betimes the Mind of this young Monarch! But by taking a contrary Course, they were the Cause of all the Troubles of this Reign.

Whilst the French were in England, Lewellyn, Prince of Wales, who was in League with them, had taken several places, of which it would have been difficult to dispossess him, without re-assembling the disbanded Troops. This however the Regent was willing to avoid, that he might not be forced to disoblige the Subjects, by Levies of Men and Money; at a time when it was necessary to gain their Affection, by causing them to enjoy the Fruits of Peace. For this reason, he granted the Prince of Wales an honorable and advantageous Peace, and procured him the Legate's Absolution, hoping thereby to induce that turbulent Prince to remain in quiet (9).

This Affair being ended, Gallo the Legate, who was recalled, set out for Rome (10). Pandulph, whom I have had frequent occasion to mention in King John's Reign, succeeded him in his Office (11).

The Orders concerning the two Charters not having been duly executed, the Regent sent Itinerant Justices into all the Counties to cause them to be better observed. He was persuaded, he could not without Injustice, and great Injury to the Honour and Interests of the young King, leave unexecuted, what the Prince and the King his Father had promised with an Oath. Had he lived any longer, he would have infallibly so ordered that Affair, as not to be easily alterable. But this great Man, equally qualified for War and Peace, died shortly after, lamented by the whole Kingdom, which he had freed from Slavery, by his Prudence and Valour (12). Peter des Roches (13), Bishop of Winchester, was made Regent, Hubert de Burgh, who defended Dover, Chief Justiciary of England (14).

The Coronation of the King had been performed at Gloster (1), in the presence of a few Lords, and with so little Solemnity, that it was thought proper to renew the Ceremony with more Pomp, in the usual Place. Cardinal Langton Archbishop of Canterbury, who returned into England after the Troubles were over, set the Crown on the King's Head, having first administered to him the customary Oath (2).

Immediately after his Coronation, Henry, attended by the new Regent, made a Progress into several Counties (3). His design was to make some Alteration with regard to the Custodies of the Castles, committed by the King his Father to such, as the new Regent thought he could not confide in. He met with no opposition but from William Earl of Albemarle, Governor of Rockingham Castle, who, setting up for a Petty Sovereign, or rather a Tyrant, took little or no notice of the Orders sent from Court. The Garrison made a Show of defending themselves, but when they saw the whole Country in Arms to assist the King, and see themselves from this Oppression, they did not stay to be compelled to surrender, but chose rather to procure some little Advantages by a Capitulation.

This Year, the new Building of the Abbey-Church of Westminster (4) was begun, the King himself laying the first Stone.

William [de Forz] Earl of Albemarle, was very uneasy at the Loss of his Castle, of which he thought himself unjustly deprived. In revenge of this pretended Injury, he fortified himself in his Castle of Bibam (5), by means of which he held the whole Country round in Subjection. He even compelled Merchants and Traders to take Poles of him, for leave to go through the Neighbourhood, without which they were in danger of being rifled. The Complaints of these Oppressions being laid before the Parliament, then assembled at Westminster, he was summoned to appear (6) and answer for himself (7). He pretended to obey, and accordingly set out, with design, as was thought, to repair to London. Mean time, he took the Road for Northamptonshire, and by surprise seized the Castle of Fotheringay, where he placed a strong Garrison, and then returned to Bibam. Upon this news, the Parliament resolved, that an Army should be immediately raised, to lay Siege to Bibam, and the Earl punished for his Insolence according to the utmost Rigour of the Law. When Earl William found, the King's Army was on the March, he retired into the North, leaving in his Castle a Governor who surrendered not till after a long Resistance. It was believed, the Rebel would be pursued, or at least compelled to quit the Kingdom: but he found means to make his peace by the Mediation of the Archbishop of York (8). That Prelate representing in his behalf, that it was but just to balance this Offence with the great Services he had done the late King, the Regent was prevailed with by that Consideration. A fatal Precedent, which afterwards encouraged other Barons to commit the same Fault without dread of Punishment!

The Court had made a Progress last Year to York, where a Marriage was agreed upon between the King of Scotland, and the Princess Joanna, Sister of the King. But as she was in the Hands of the Earl of March, to whose eldest Son she was contracted, it was no easy matter to get her thence. However, after some Negotiations, she was at length sent back to the King her Brother; and her Nuptials with the King of Scotland were solemnized this Year. Shortly after, Hubert de Burgh, Chief Justiciary, espoused the eldest Sister of that Prince: An Honour, which by procuring him the Alliance of two Monarchs, might one Day raise some one of his Posterity to the Throne of Scotland.

Peves, and the present Ministry, to keep the Peace of the Kingdom, there were Persons who made it their Business to disturb it. They had hold of an opportunity, which a Quarrel between the Citizens of Westminster, furnished them with. A great Wrestling Match being made between the Londoners and the Country People (10), abundance of Westminster Men came to the Place appointed, and being desirous to dispute the Prize, had the Mortification to see their Neighbours gain the Honour of the Victory. This Honour, though in itself very small, raised however the Jealousy of the Westminster Men, who were exposed to the insulting Railleries of the Conquerors. The Steward of the Abbot of Westminster, passionately imagining, his Masters, and his own Honour were concerned in the Cause, undertook to revenge his Fellow-Citizens, and cause them to be even with their Neighbours. To that end, he appointed another Match (11) at Westminster, to which the Citizens of London flocked in great Numbers. But as they went without Arms, they were rudely attacked by the Westminster Men, who wounded several, and put the rest to flight. This Treachery caused a terrible Commotion in London. The Mob being got together, resolved to be revenged for this Outrage; the Authority of the Mayor (12) not being able to curb them. A Citizen of London, one Constantine, an incendiary, who had been a zealous Stickler for the French, during the Troubles, heading the Rabble, did all he could to inflame their Rage. He represented to them, it was in vain to expect Justice from Magistrates, regardless of the Honour of the City, and therefore they ought, without delay, to make their Enemies know, the Citizens of London were not to be attacked with Impunity. His speech meeting with Applause, he cried with a loud Voice, Monks St. Dennis, the Watch word of the French; and marching towards Westminster at the Head of the Mob, caused the Steward's House to be pulled down to the Ground, after which he returned in Triumph to London. The Tumult being appeased, Hubert, Chief Justiciary, came to the Tower, and commanded several of the Citizens to appear before him. Constantine was there among the rest, and maintained to the Justiciary's Face, that the Citizens of London had done nothing punishable by the Law, and were resolved to stand by what they had done. Hubert seeing this Insolence, dismissed all the rest, and detaining Constantine, ordered him to be hanged next Morning (13), tho' he offered a thousand Marks (14) for his Life. The Justiciary's Severity did not stop here. A few Days after, he caused to be seized in their Houses the chief Rioters, some of whom had their Hands, and others their Noses and Ears cut off, and then were sent back thus maimed into the City. After this he turned out all the Magistrates of London, and obliged thirty of the most considerable Citizens to be Pledges for the good Behaviour of the City, to which the Communities agreed by a Charter, sealed with their common Seal (15). This Rigour might have been justifiable, if Hubert had not acted in an arbitrary manner, and directly contrary to the Tenor of the Great Charter, which ordered, pursuant to the ancient Custom of the Kingdom, that every Man should be tried by his Peers (16). Hence he became odious to the Nation, and especially to the Londoners, who did not fail to make him feel the Effects of their Hatred, when it was in their Power.

These arbitrary Proceedings of the chief Justiciary, obliged the Parliament, which met some time after at London (17), to request the King, that he would be pleased to cause the Charter of Liberties, which he had sworn to confirm, to be observed throughout the Kingdom. The Request was not at all relished by those who were then at the Helm. Since the Death of the Earl of Peves, the Court, with the new Ministry, had taken up new Maxims, inasmuch that what appeared to the former Regent to be highly just, seemed the reverse to the present Ministers. When the Parliament presented their Petition to the King, one of his Counsellors (18) expressed 1224. confiscated his Estate, and banished him the Realm. Henry obtained, for the Charges of this Expedition, an Aid of two Shillings upon every Hide of Arable Land (1).

1225. But he wanted greater Sums to carry on the War with France. For the obtaining whereof he call'd another Parliament. The Parliament told him, they would readily grant him the Aid he required, provided the Charters of King John, which had all along been neglected, were punctually observed for the future. The King's Circumstances not suffering him to deny their Request, he granted it in a handsome manner, and even sent into every County Commissioners to see the Charters executed (2). But the Effects of these Orders were of no long Continuance. However, People were so well satisfied of the King's good Intentions, that never was Tax levied with more exactness. To smooth the way, the Bishops excommunicated all that should be guilty of any Fraud (3).

The King made use of this Money to raise an Army, which was sent into Guienne, under the Command of Prince Richard his Brother, lately made Earl of Cornwall. Richard, having the Earl of Salisbury for his Lieutenant, made some Progress in Guienne, where he took St. Macaire. After that, he besieged the Castle of La Reule, a strong Place, which, by its resistance, gave the Earl of Marche, General of the French Army, time to come to its Relief. The English Historians pretend, Richard obtained a considerable Advantage over the Earl. The French, on the contrary, say, that perceiving he was not strong enough to hazard a Battle, he retired beyond the Dordogne, and shortly after into England. It is certain however, Richard quitted not Guienne till 1227, as appears from the Collection of Publick Acts.

The Year 1226, began with a Parliament (4), wherein the King, who was recovered from a dangerous Illness, was declared of full Age, though he was not yet so old as the Law required. But this was not the only Business for which the Parliament was called. A Legate, lately arrived from Rome, had an extraordinary Proposal to impart to them from the Pope, which concerned the whole Kingdom, and especially the Clergy. The Substance of the Proposal was, That, since the Holy See had long lain under the Scandal of doing nothing without Money, it was for the Honour and Interest of all Christians to wipe away this Reproach, by removing the Cause. That it was notorious to all, the extreme Poverty of the Church of Rome, laid her under an absolute Necessity of demanding some Acknowledgment, for the Favours she dispensed to her Sons; that she desired nothing more than to be in a Capacity to proceed with Moderation; and the best means to that end would be, for the Faithful to grant her Aids proportionable to her Wants. Then the Legate proposed, that, to supply the urgent Occasions of the Holy See, there should be set apart for that purpose, out of every Cathedral, two Prebendaries; and out of every Monastery, two Monks Portions; and that this Grant should be confirmed by Parliament. He supported his Proposal with the most specious Reasons he could devise; without promising however, that the Pope would take nothing for his future Favours, but only insinuating, he would use more Moderation in that respect. It was not very difficult to perceive the Pope's Aim. Therefore all the Legate's Eloquence was not able to prevail with the Parliament, who, to his great Mortification, did not even vouchsafe to give him an Answer. When he would have complained of this disobliging Treatment of the Pope, he was told, the Absence of the King and some of the principal Bishops, prevented the taking into consideration a Proposal of that Nature. Not discouraged at this Repulse, he required that the Session of Parliament should be continued, till the King and the absent Prelates were come. But his Instances were not regarded, and the Parliament broke up, without coming to any Resolution; so that the Legate was forced to wait with patience till the next Session. Mean time, he took a Journey into the northern Counties, where, under pretence of the Right of Procurations (5), he oppressed the Churches to such a degree, that they were forced to complain to the Pope, who recalled him for 1226. fear of exasperating the English at so critical a Juncture. However, the Pope, who did not yet despair of obtaining what he had demanded, enjoined the Archbishop of Canterbury to cause the Parliament to meet again, and require a positive Answer to the Proposal made by his Legate. The King having advised with the Bishops, sent the Pope word, that, since this Affair did not only concern England, but all Christendom too, he was ready to conform to the Resolutions which should be taken in other Christian Countries. This was properly a civil Denial; for it was well known, a Legate had made the same Proposal in France, but to no manner of purpose.

Mean time, Henry continued his Preparations to carry War into France. But he found himself obliged to suspend them; for Lewis, engaging to command a Crusade against the Albigenses, had procured the Pope's express Orders to all Christian Princes, not to give him any Disturbance during his Expedition. Henry consulting his Parliament upon these Orders, was advised to put off the War till the return of the King of France, who was then besieging Avignon, where Entrance was denied him. This Prince died soon after his taking that Place, not without Suspicion of being poisoned by the Earl of Champagne, who was desperately in love with the Queen. Lewis IX, his Son, succeeded him, under the Guardianship of Blanch of Castile his Mother, who, though a Foreigner, had Interest enough to obtain the Regency of the Kingdom.

Whilst the English Arms were suspended by the superior Orders of the Court of Rome, Henry began his Majesty with an Act of Injustice, for which he had not the least Colour. As he durst not demand any Money of the Parliament (6), who had so lately granted him a very considerable Aid, he bethought himself of an Expedient, formerly used by Richard his Uncle on the like Occasion, after his return from the Holy Land: Which was, to oblige all those that had Charters to renew them, upon payment of such a Sum. This Order, the only end whereof was to fill the King's Coffers, fell the heaviest upon the Monasteries. All unjust Methods invented by Princes to extort Money from their Subjects, are so many inexhaustible Springs of Oppression; Successors seldom failing to follow these ill Precedents.

In the beginning of the next Year, the sudden Death of the Earl of Salisbury, natural Son of Henry II, at a Banquet, to which he was invited by the Chief Justiciary, gave occasion for strong Suspicions of that Minister (7). However, no Inquiry was made, none daring to attack directly a Favourite, who had an absolute Sway over the King. As Henry advanced in Years, he was observed to have Qualities little consistent with a great Prince; an extreme Avarice, an astonishing Fickleness, great Caprice and Unevenness in his Conduct, an unusual Easiness to be governed by those about him; and beyond all this, Principles of Oppression and Tyranny, which afforded a terrible Prospect for the future. Though he was declared of Age the last Year, he kept the Bishop of Winchester near his Person, for the sake of his Advice: but Hubert de Burgh would not suffer him to retain him any longer. He represented to him, that though he was declared of full Age, he would always be considered as under the Guardianship of a Regent, as long as that Prelate was at Court; and it was for his Honour and Interest to shew his Subjects he was capable of governing by himself. This Advice being readily embraced by the King, who perceived not the Motive, the Bishop of Winchester was ordered to return to his Diocese.

The English would have been unconcerned, and perhaps glad at the Bishop's Disgrace, if it had not been immediately followed by an Event, which convinced them, it would have been better that the King's Favour had been always divided. As soon as Hubert saw himself without a Rival in the Ministry, he endeavoured to set himself above the Laws, by persuading his Master that his sole Aim was to render him absolute. It was not difficult to engage in this Project, a Prince that was sufficiently inclined to himself. Besides the forementioned Renewal of the Charters, he had extorted five thousand Marks from the Londoners under pretence of their lending the like Sum to Prince

(7) He was Son of Henry II, by Isabella. His Body was buried at Old Sarum, and from thence removed to the new City, and interred in a Monastery, on the North side of the Chapel of our Lady, in the Cathedral Church, in a Tomb of White Marble, supported by two Pillars. His Effigies is that of grey Marble, in his Coat of Arms, his sword by his side, and upon his antique Shield, are six Lions rampant embowed the one above the other. He is represented also upon his Tomb, but by reason of the many Foldings thereof, is not easily perceived. His marriage was, Daughters and Heirs of the Kings of France. His Wife being so young he had four Sons and four Daughters. He was succeeded by his eldest Son William Longshanks, called the Conqueror. Summa, lib. 3. c. 359.

1227. Lewis, when he left England. The Town of Northampton was compelled to pay him twelve hundred Pounds, on some other no less frivolous Pretence. The Monasteries had met with no better Quarter. Notwithstanding their Appeal to the Holy See, he had exacted from them large Sums, whilst the Affair was depending before the Pope. These things were plain Indications, how little he was disposed to keep any measures with his Subjects, and began to cause him to forfeit their Esteem. But what he did further, by the violent Councils of the Judiciary, entirely alienated their Affection. On a sudden, when it was least expected, he annulled the two Charters of the King his Father, though he had bound himself by Oath inviolably to observe them; pretending he was not obliged to stand to what he had promised during his Minority. Hubert for his part, regardless of the Murmurs of the People, by whom he was deemed the Author of these pernicious Councils, caused himself to be created Earl of Kent, in reward of the great Service lately done his Master, in freeing him from the Yoke of these Charters.

The Conduct of the King and his Minister, bred such Discontent among the Barons, that it was easy to see their little Affection for their Sovereign. Prince Richard, who arrived from Guienne soon after the Revoking of the Charters, improved the present Disposition of the Barons, to brave the King his Brother, in a Contest he had with him. The Occasion was this, King John having given one Waleran, a German, a certain Manor belonging to the Earldom of Cornwall, Richard, as soon as he was invested with that Earldom, ordered Waleran to appear and produce his Title, and in the mean time caused the Manor to be seized. Whether Waleran had lost his Charter, or thought it defective, he refused to obey the Summons. On the contrary, as if great Injustice had been done him, he carried his Complaints to the King, who, without examining the Affair, ordered the Prince's Officers to restore the Manor. They found means however to be excused till the Return of their Master. Upon his Arrival, Richard represented to the King, that he had done Waleran no wrong in obliging him to shew his original Title: That his Intent was not to deprive him of his Lands by force, but to have the Matter decided by the Laws, and to that end offered, to refer it to the Judgment of the Peers of the Realm. Henry, offended at this Proposal, fell into a Passion with his Brother, and commanded him to restore the Manor in dispute, by such a time, or depart the Kingdom. Richard boldly replied, that he would do neither without the Judgment of his Peers, and immediately retired without staying for an Answer. The Judiciary, who never ceased to inspire the King with violent Maxims, advised him to take the Prince into Custody. But whilst Henry considered of taking this Step, Richard withdrew from Court, and posted to the Earl of Pembroke, to consult him upon this Affair. Pembroke approved of what the Prince had done, and perceiving this to be a favorable Opportunity to check the arbitrary Power, the King had a mind to usurp, believed he ought to improve it. And therefore he assured Richard, he was ready to assist him with his Life and Fortune, and did not question but most of the Barons would do the same. Indeed, shortly after, by the Diligence of the Earl-Marshal, the Earls of Glocester, Chester, Warren, Warwick, Bevers, and Hereford, with many other Barons (1), joined with Richard, and took up Arms, to compel the King to restore the Charters he had lately annulled. Hubert was alarmed at this Confederacy. As he foresaw it might be attended with fatal Consequences, he chose to procure a Reconciliation between the two Brothers.

To satisfy Prince Richard, the chief of the Confederates, he got the King to settle upon him the Queen their Mother's Dowry, to which he pretended a Right; and likewise to augment his Appenage with the Lands held by the late Earl of Boulogne. Richard, content with this Liberality, said no more of restoring the Charters, and the Confederacy was dissolved. Thus the Great, under the Pretence of the publick Good, promote their Interest, or gratify their Passions. But when means are found to satisfy them, as to what concerns them in particular, they discover, that the publick Good was the least of their Views (2).

Pope Honorius III. died this Year, and was succeeded by Gregory IX.

Stephen Langton, Cardinal, and Archbishop of Canterbury, outlived Honorius but a few Months (3). His Eyes were no sooner closed, but the Monks of St. Augustin, willing to secure the Privilege of electing their Archbishop, immediately chose Walter de Homgham, one of their Fellow Monks. The King was offended at this Election being made without his Licence (4), and refused to confirm their choice, because, as he alleged, the Father of this Monk was hanged for Theft. On the other hand, the Suffragan Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, angry that he was chosen without their Consent, refused to accept him, because he had corrupted a Nun, by whom he had several Children. Upon this he sent Agents to Rome (5) to have the Matter decided there. Mean time the Church of Canterbury remained vacant.

This Year the Welsh making Irruptions into England, the King marched into their Country to chastise them. But after harassing his Troops to no purpose, he returned without making any Progress (6).

This same Year, the Pope thundered out a Bull of Excommunication against the Emperor Frederic II. for neglecting to carry his Arms into the Holy Land, as he had solemnly vow'd. How haughty soever this Monarch might be, he was forced to bend under the Papal Power, and perform his Vow the next Year.

Whilst these things passed, the Regency of Blanch, Mother of St. Lewis, occasioned, in France, Disturbances, which Henry might have turn'd to his Advantage, had he known how to improve them. But this Prince was not of an enterprising Genius. If ever he formed any Projects, it was always in disadvantageous Circumstances, whilst he neglected the most favorable. A fairer opportunity than this had never offered, to recover the Provinces, the English had lost in France, had it been well managed. The Normans siding with the confederate Barons against the Queen-Regent of France, sent Henry word, that if he would come in Person, he should be received with open Arms, and put in possession of that rich Province. On the other hand, the Poitevins importuned him to come and seize such of their Towns as were in the hands of the French, offering him their Assistance. At the same time the Gasccons sent the Archbishop of Bordeaux (7) to inform him, it was now in his Power, by taking advantage of the Commotions in France, to expel the French out of the Places they were possessed of in Guienne. Such pressing Invitations, at so favorable a Juncture, should have induced Henry to make a vigorous Push, for the Recovery of what the King his Father had lost by his Negligence. But, by a Blindness imputed to the Councils of the Judiciary, he answered, he would stay for a more convenient Opportunity, as if he had been sure of one every Day. We shall see hereafter that he rashly embarked in this Undertaking, at a time when there was not the least Appearance of Success. Thus did this Prince blindly suffer himself to be guided by his Ministers, who abused his Easiness and Weakness to advance their own Affairs, without any Regard to the Interests of their Master.

Mean time, the Dispute concerning the Election of the Pope the Archbishop of Canterbury, was carried on at Rome with great warmth, though the Pope was not yet pleased to determine the Matter. But at length, the King's Envoys offering the Pope a Tenth of all the Moveables in England and Ireland, and this Offer opening his Eyes, he voided the Election made by the Monks. At the same time, under colour of preventing any future Dispute he himself conferred the Archiepiscopal Dignity on Richard le Grand, Chancellor of the Church of Lincoln (8), wherein he outdid even Innocent III, who was willing at least to keep up some Form, in causing Langton to be elected by the Monks that were sent to him. Though this Incroachment of Gregory was of a more dangerous Consequence than that of Innocent, yet the King and the Suffragan Bishops received the new Archbishop, pleaded

Whilst they were at Work, the Welsh came upon them, and forced them to retire into the Castle, which they besieged. But the King and Hubert (to whom that Castle belonged, and who led the Siege) were then carried on the Works as far as a Cistercian Monastery, called Grice, which they burned. Hubert burning the Place to be impregnable, ordered a Castle to be built there; but the Welsh so distressed King Henry's Army, which by the way inwardly favored Lewis, that Henry was forced to make a disadvantageous Peace; one Article whereof was, That this Castle should be demolished, and Lewis should give Henry for his Conquest three thousand Marks. *M. 1228. with having voided the Monk's Election, without troubling themselves about the Prejudice the Church of England thereby received. Shortly after, Gregory, who would not long be deprived of the Effect of the Promises lately made him, sent one of his Chaplains into England to collect the promised Tenth, which were to be expended in his War with the Emperor. The King assembling the Parliament (1) upon this occasion, the Chaplain laid before them the Pope's Letters, strongly urging the Performance of what he had been made to expect. All Eyes were fixed upon the King, in expectation that he would oppose this Exaction, and disclaim his Envoys. But when he was seen to keep silence, it was easily perceived, the Promise had been made by his Order, or at least that he had not the Courage to contradict the Pope's Will. The Lords (2) therefore thought it their Duty to shew greater Resolution than the King. The Affair seemed to them of such Consequence, that they unanimously resolved, not to suffer their Lay-tees to be thus liable to the Exactions of the Court of Rome. However, to satisfy the Pope in some measure, they proposed to give him a certain Sum, without inquiring into the Effects of each particular Person. In all appearance this Method would have been taken, had not Stephen de Segrav, one of the Barons, voluntarily submitted to the Pope's Demands, and drawn in others by his Example. The Number of those that suffered themselves to be gained, increasing by degrees, the greatest Opposers were forced to yield, that they might not incur the Indignation of the King and the Pope. The Clergy durst still less venture to resist, for fear of being exposed to the Excommunication they were threatened with. The Nuncio, having thus attained his ends, produced a full Power from his Master to collect the Tax, which was to be paid out of all Moveables whatever. He executed his Orders so rigorously, that he caused the Tenth of all sorts of Fruits, even of such as were yet growing, to be paid him in Money. Neither was this all. That this Tax might be levied with the more speed, he obliged the Bishops to advance the Money for the interior Clergy, empowering them to reimburse themselves in the manner they should think proper. The Prelates and Abbots therefore were under a Necessity of finding ready Money. But as several were not able to raise it soon enough, the Nuncio had provided against this Inconvenience, by bringing with him certain Italian Usurers, who lent them Money at an extravagant Interest. Thus did the Pope abuse the King's Weakness, who might easily have prevented this Exaction, by a vigorous Opposition. For the Earl of Chester, his Subject, had the Power to hinder this Tax from being levied upon his Lands, by stoutly maintaining, in spite of the Nuncio's Clamours, that the Pope had nothing to do with Lay-Fees. But besides, that Henry was terrified by the Example of the King his Father, which was ever in his Thoughts, he had another Reason that induced him to this Condescension for the Pope. In his Project of rendering himself absolute, and raising Money upon his Subjects by all sorts of ways, he was very sensible, he should need the Pope's Protection, and nothing could procure it him sooner, than to let him share in these Exactions. Accordingly, we shall see in the Sequel of this Reign, that the Pope and the King mutually stood by one another, whenever the Business was to extort Money from the English.

The Nation had scarce forgot the Pope's late Oppression, when they saw themselves obliged to furnish the King with means to make War upon the King of France. After the Disturbances in that Kingdom were appeased, and consequently the Opportunity of improving them was lost, Henry formed the Design of recovering by Arms the Provinces taken from the King his Father; without considering that the Posture of Affairs in France was very much altered, the Lords, that opposed the Queen Regent, being all humbled, and no longer able to assist him. To put this Design in execution, he resolved to make great Preparations; and for that purpose summoned all the Vassals of the Crown (3) to meet him, after Mabamass, at Portsmouth, where he assembled one of the finest Armies that had ever been raised in England (4). However, this extraordinary Armament proved in vain, by reason when the Troops came to be embarked, there were not Ships enough to transport them. This Disappointment threw the King into such a Passion with Hubert de Burgh, who had taken upon him to get all things ready, that he called him, Old Traitor. He charged him with receiving a Bribe from the Court of France (5), to put a Stop to this Design, and in his Rage drew his Sword to kill him; which he would, probably, have done, if the Earl of Chester had not interposed, not so much to save the Juristician, as to prevent the King from imbruing his Hands in the Blood of one of his Subjects. It does not appear whether Hubert acted out of Fear, Design or Negligence: but however that be, the Embarkment was forced to be retarded the whole Winter. To this the Arrival of Peter de Daux Earl of Britagne did not a little contribute; who perceiving, so much time had been lost in waiting for Transport-Ships, and that the English Army, the Season being too far advanced, would be obliged to take up their Winter Quarters in his Dominions where they were to land, advised the King to defer the Undertaking till the Spring. During this Interval, Hubert found means to be received into favour again, and to have the Administration of Affairs as before.

This same Year, the Emperor Frederic carried his Arms into Palestine, and compelled the Sultan of Egypt to surrender Jerusalem (6). He would have passed his Conquests farther, had not the Excommunication, denounced upon him by the Pope the last Year, weighed more with the Templars and Hospitallars of the Holy Land, than the Valour of that Prince. Their Prejudice against him rose to that height, that they plotted to deliver him into the hands of the Sultan, to whom they had even communicated their Design. But this Prince, though an Infidel, abhorring their Treachery, was so generous as to discover to Frederic. This Generosity turned more to his Advantage, than the having the Emperor in his Power. By that means he sowed among the Christians of Palestine such Discord, as was extremely prejudicial to their Affairs. Frederic finding he could expect no assistance from the Christians of the Holy Land, and that the Pope diverted to other Uses the Crusades designed against the Saracens, made a ten Years Truce with the Sultan, and returned into Europe.

Though Henry waited with Impatience for the Spring, in order to transport his Army into France, his Stay in England during the Winter was not in vain. He procured a considerable Present from the Clergy, exacted also a large Sum from the City of London, and to leave no means untried to raise Money, compelled the Jews, who were then very numerous in the Kingdom, to pay him a third Part of their Substance. As soon as the Spring was come he embarked with his Army at Portsmouth (7), and landed at St. Malo (8), where he was received by the Earl of Britagne, who put into his hands all his strong Towns and Castles. Mean time the French, having had all the Winter to prepare, were posted near Angers, with design to hinder his march into Poitou. Henry gave them time to fortify themselves in their Post, whilst he continued at Nantes expecting the rest of his Troops, which were to come from Ireland. Though by the prudent Conduct of the Queen-Regent of France, the Malecontents were humbled, and had promised to remain in quiet, they no sooner saw the King of England in Britagne, and all Lewis's Forces employed in those Parts, but they began to stir again. Upon which the King and the Queen-Regent were obliged to quit Anjou, in order to oppose the Designs of the Malecontents, which seemed to them of worse Consequence than the Progress the English might make. This was the time for Henry to act vigorously, and improve the present juncture, especially as the Normans pressed him to march into their Country, where they were ready to receive him, and assist him to the utmost of their Power. But though he was inclined to turn that way, it is pretended, he was dissuaded by his Favourite, who told him the Attempt was liable to very great Difficulties. Instead therefore of marching into Normandy, he went directly to Poitou, and took the Castle of Mirabel. After which, as if he intended to shew the French Malecontents, they were to expect nothing from him, he came to Gutienne, to receive the Fealty of the Gascans. In short, after losing much time, he returned into Britagne, where he employed himself in such a manner, as demonstrated his little Inclination for War. This Conduct gave occasion to suspect his Ministers, of holding Intelligence with the Enemy, who had sufficient time to appease the Troubles of the Kingdom. Accordingly, the Queen-Regent took this opportunity, which was to be unseasonably given her, to be reconciled with the confederate Barons (9).

1229. They readily consented to a Peace, when they found Henry made no advances to support them.

As soon as the Queen-Regent had nothing to fear from the Barons, she ordered the Army to march towards Breteigne, where Henry was lavishing away the Remains of his Money in Entertainments and Diversions, as if, in leaving England he intended only to take a Journey of Pleasure (1). Upon the first News of the Enemy's Approach, finding his Treasure spent, and fearing to draw upon himself all the Forces of France, he shamefully returned into England (2). May, he was very hardly prevailed with to leave Part of his Army in Breteigne, under the Command of the Earls of Chester and Pembroke (3), to support the Earl, whom he had unfeignably engaged in the War. These Lords, less timorous than their King, with these few Troops, not only hindered the French from entering Breteigne, but made Incursions into Agins and Normandy, from whence they carried away a great Booty. Thus ended this Expedition. Instead of procuring any Advantage to Henry, it served only to render him contemptible to his Subjects, who would never more hearken to an Expedition against France, seeing he had made such ill Use of so favorable a Juncture. He cast the whole Blame on the Treachery of the Earl of Marche and the Poitevins, who performed not what they had promised. But he was himself the Cause of their Change, since, in all appearance, they would not have deserted him, if his Proceedings had given them any hopes of a powerful Protection.

During Henry's Absence in Breteigne, some Commotions happened in Ireland (4). The King of Connaught, willing to take advantage of the Weakness of the English, whose best Troops were sent to the King, invaded their Territories with a great Army, or rather with Multitudes of unwelcome People. But he found in Geoffrey de Maris, Justiciary of Ireland (5), a more formidable Enemy than he expected, who, killing twenty thousand of the Irish, took their King himself Prisoner.

Tho' the King had consumed in needless Expenses, the Sum granted him for the French War, he made that dishonourable Expedition a Pretence to demand a new Aid. The Parliament (6) were very unwilling to comply, but however were prevailed with at length by the Consideration of his great Wants, and granted him a Scutage of three Marks upon every Knight's Fee, hold of the Crown (-).

Shortly after, Richard Archbishop of Canterbury complained to the King, that upon the Death of the Earl of Gloucester, Hubert de Burgh had seized the Castle of Tunbridge, though it was a Fief of the Archbishoprick. Henry told him, the Wardship of the young Earl of Gloucester belonging to him, it was his Prerogative to dispose of it to his Justiciary, during the Heir's Minority; adding, he thought it very strange that he should call his Right in question. This Answer not satisfying the Archbishop, he excommunicated, without distinction, all such as wrongfully detained the Church's Lands, and immediately departed to carry his Complaints to the Pope.

About the same time, Prince Richard, the King's Brother, married the Countess-Dowager of Gloucester (8), Sister of the Earl of Pembroke, who died soon after his Sister's Marriage (9). He left his Estate by Will to Richard his Brother, who was still in Breteigne, where he did the State signal Services. A three Months Truce giving him leisure to return into England, he demanded his Brother's Inheritance, seized by the King. Henry wanting an excuse to enjoy the Profits, answered, That he heard his Brother's Widow was with Child, and therefore could not dispose of the Inheritance till she was delivered. But as he knew the Falseness of this, he sought a more plausible Pretence. He charged Richard with holding criminal Correspondence with France whilst in Breteigne; and without suffering him to vindicate himself, commanded him to depart the Kingdom within fifteen Days. It was shocking to an English Earl to see himself treated in this manner. But it was still more so to the Son of that Earl of Pembroke, who had set the Crown on the King's

Head, and established him in the Throne, in spite of his Enemies. Richard indeed quitted England, but it was to pass into Ireland, where he took possession of the Castles and Lands belonging to his Family. Which done, he levied Troops, and made himself friends out of the King's Demerits, for what was unjustly detested from him in England. Whether Henry desired the Consequences of this Revolt, or was made sensible that the Justice done the Earl was too manifest to be maintained, he recalled him from Banishment, gave him possession of his Estate, and invested him with the Office of Chief Marshal, enjoyed by his Brother. It was the Temper of this Prince, to behave haughtily to such as he thought unable to resist him, and to yield on a sudden to those that opposed him.

Llewellyn Prince of Wales, having lately made some Incursions into the Borders of England, Henry let him proceed for some time. But when he thought the Prince no longer expected to be attacked, he resolved to go in Person and chastise him (10). However, upon the first Resistance, his valiant Ardour abated, and he returned without effecting any thing.

Though Henry was now in the twenty fifth Year of his Age, he had been forced to live unmarried, because all his Projects on that account had miscarried. His first Design was to espouse Yolande, Daughter of the Duke of Bretagne, to whom he was engaged by Oath. But whether the Pope refused a Dispensation, or for some other Reason, the Design was not executed. A Match was likewise proposed between him and the Duke of Aquitaine's Daughter, but with no better success. Some time after, he wrote to the Archbishop of Cologne, to importune him in his intent of entering into a strict Alliance with the Empire, by marrying the Daughter of the King of Bohemia. But we don't find this Affair was carried any further. He had also the Morification to be disappointed of this very Year, in his Design of espousing the second Daughter of the King of Scotland, Sister of the Justiciary's Wife. The jealousy of the English Barons put a Stop to this Marriage. As they could not bear to see the King married to the younger Sister of the Wife of one of his Subjects, they were so urgent with him to divert him from it, that he did not think fit to conclude this Affair, which met with so strong Opposition. It shall add here, to avoid mentioning it elsewhere, that, four Years after, he would have married the Daughter of the Earl of Pontieu; but this Project, like the rest, came to nothing. Though he was contracted to her, and Ambassadors were dispatched for the Pope's Dispensation, he altered his mind whilst they were on the Road, and sent them Orders not to speak of the Affair.

The Archbishop of Canterbury so effectually pleaded for his Cause at Rome, that he obtained an Order from the Pope, to take possession of the Castle of Tunbridge, during the Nonage of the Earl of Gloucester. But he could not reap the Benefit of this Favour: Death seizing upon him, he was returning to England (11). When the Monks of St. Augustine heard the News, they fort with the Bishop of Winchester (12) Chancellor of the Exchequer. The King enquiring their Cause, invited the Bishop with the Temporalities of the Archbishoprick. But the Archbishop ever could never obtain the Pope's Confirmation, to whom it was represented (13) that he was too much a Courtier. This Reason was so far from inducing the Pope to void the sentence, and give leave to the Monks to create a Person more devoted to the Holy See.

In the beginning of the Year 1232, Henry called a Parliament (14), of whom he demanded an Aid, to enable him to pay the Debts contracted by his late Expedition into France. The Earl of Chester replied, in the Name of all the Barons, that they had assisted him not only with their Money, but also their Persons, and therefore owed him no further Aid. The Clergy, who were no better inclined to the King, desiring time to consider of the Matter, the Parliament was prorogued till Easter. (15)

Besides, that the King had made an ill use of the Aids granted him by the Parliament, he gave the Clergy, Nobility, and People, another and no less grievous Cause of Discontent. They saw, the King openly favoured the Usurpations of the Court of Rome, and by an affected Connivance, suffered the Pope to trample daily upon the Rights of the Church and the Kingdom. The Popes, not contented with exacting from time to time, on divers Pretences, large Sums from the Clergy, were maliciously aiming at getting into their hands the Collations of all the vacant Benefices, and consequently the Rights of the Patrons were going to be quickly abolished. Moreover, the conferring of almost all the Benefices upon Italians, or other Foreigners, could not but very much incense the English. This Disgust was carried so far, that above fourscore Persons of Quality entered into a Confederacy to dispossess the Italian Ecclesiastics, of whatever they held in England. The Confederates, having chosen one Tuenge (1) for their Leader, forcibly entered several Houses, of these Foreigners, and carrying away what things of value they met with, distributed them to the Poor. This was done with so little noise, that not a Soul stirred, either to oppose or punish the Authors. But the Pope, who was soon informed thereof, wrote so severe a Letter to the King, that to judge by the Contents, one would have thought the Church had received a mortal Wound. Besides, without considering that the Laws and Customs of England required a previous Process and Examination of Matters, he commanded the King, to punish immediately, the Disturbers of the Church's Peace, upon pain of Excommunication and Interdict, if he deferred a moment the Chastisement of the Guilty. These Threats obliging the King to issue out Orders to make strict Inquiry after the Authors of this Violence, he found there were more Persons concerned in it than he imagined, and that the Bishops themselves were in the Plot, or had countenanced it by their Silence. However, for the Pope's Satisfaction, and sent to Rome, pursuant to his Holiness's Order. Some Sheriffs and other Officers were imprisoned, for neglecting to suppress the Riot. In all likelihood the Number and Quality of the Parties concerned, prevented any further Prosecution of this Affair (2).

During these Transactions, the Monks of St. Augustin having elected another Archbishop (3), according to the Orders they had received, and their Choice not being more agreeable to the Pope than the former (4), they were intreated to proceed to a third Election.

How great a Calm soever there seemed to be for some Years in the King's Court, a Storm was secretly gathering against the Judiciary, which proved the more fatal to him, as he was not prepared for it. Ever since the King was perceived capable of entertaining Suspicions of his Favourite, the Enemies of Hubert had not ceased to do him ill Offices. Their Projects were so well managed, that the King was persuaded to recall the Bishop of Winchester to Court, and make him one of his Counsellors. This Prelate had no sooner the King's Ear, but he laboured incessantly the ruin of the Favourite; being sensible, his own Safety depended on the Downfall of his Rival. As he earnestly sought all occasions to compass his ends, an opportunity soon offered, which he failed not to improve. The Prince of Wales having made without opposition several IncurSIONS into England, the Bishop of Winchester represented to the King, how great a Reproach it was, that so despicable a People as the Welsh should thus plunder his Subjects, and no endeavours be used to prevent it. The King replied, "He was so far from having Money to undertake a War, that his Treasurers had even told him, his Revenues would scarce suffice for the necessary Expenses of his Family." These Words furnished the Bishop with what he wanted, namely, a Pretence to blame the Conduct of the Prime Minister. He told the King, "The Want he complained of, proceeded from the Ill-management of the Treasury: That the Persons through whose Hands the Money passed, were not called to an Account: That the Wardship of Minors was continually given to private Persons without any Benefit to his Exchequer: That he received no Profit from the Revenues of the vacant Benefices; or from the Lands which by Death or Confiscation, fell to the Crown." He added, that by these means the Kings and his Predecessors were wont to fill their Coffers, and consequently stood not so much in need of Parliamentary Aids, but lived in a greater Independence." Henry, improving this Advice, called all his Sheriffs, and such as had the management of the Treasury, to Account, and made Peter de Rivaux, the Bishop of Winchester's Nephew (5), Treasurer of his Chamber. This was only a Trial of the Bishop's Credit, to pave the way to the execution of his main Design. These Changes were followed by some others, tending to remove from Court the Creatures of the Judiciary, whose Interest visibly decreased, as his Rival's gained Ground. In short, the Bishop knew so well how to manage the King, that he caused Segrave, his principal Confidant, to be promoted (6) to the Office of Judiciary in the room of Hubert, who was turned out, though he had a Patent for that Dignity during Life.

It seldom happens that a Favourite falls easy. The hatred of the Prince is proportionable to his past Affection; the former of these two Passions hardly ever failing to be as violent as the latter. Princes generally act on their occasions from a Principle of Pride, very often to themselves unperceivable. As their Affection cools, they endeavour to justify their Inconstancy, and frequently upbraid the Favourite for the very Thing which before was the Cause of their Love. Of this we have a remarkable Instance in the ruin of Hubert de Burgh. Never had Favourite a greater Ascendant over his Master. His Counsels, which flattered all the King's Passions, were regarded, whilst in Favour, as so many Oracles. But when the King had entertained a Prejudice against him, he considered his former Advices as so many Treacheries. Indeed, it would be difficult to vindicate all the Actions of this Favourite. But, very probably, among the Things laid to his Charge, there were many false Imputations. Be this as it will, a few days after his removal, the King sent for him, and required him to give an Account of all the Money that had passed through his Hands (7); which being very hard to do, Hubert endeavoured to be excused. He produced King John's Charter, declaring he was so well satisfied of his Faithfulness, that he discharged him from all Accounts. The Bishop of Winchester replied, the Charter might be valid as to what passed in the late Reign, but was of no Force to exempt him from giving an account of his Administration, during the present. He added, this was not the only Thing he was charged with: That he was accused moreover of several Crimes, and particularly of having given the King pernicious Counsels, to the great Prejudice of his and the Kingdom's Affairs. Hubert perceiving by these Accusations, that his Ruin was resolved, desired time to give in his Answer; which could not be refused him. For the Bishop of Winchester, who stood in need of the Barons to condemn him, durst not disoblige them, by denying Hubert a Privilege common to him with all the Peers of the Realm. It may be, they would have made it their own Cause, if the Court had persisted in denying his Request.

Whether Hubert was conscious of his Guilt, or despaired of vindicating his Innocence before Judges, several of whom were his professed Enemies, instead of appearing on the Day appointed, he took Sanctuary in the Priory of Merton, from whence he hoped none would dare to force him. Some time after, the Parliament being met at Langbeith (8), an Aid of the fortieth Part of the Moveables of the whole Nation was granted to the King (9). Which done, the Lords petitioning that Hubert de Burgh's Trial might proceed, he was summoned to appear, but refused to obey. Upon which the King, who was of a violent Temper, commanded the Mayor of London to force him from his Sanctuary, and bring him either dead or alive. The Citizens very joyfully embraced this opportunity of being revenged upon Hubert, for whom they had entertained a mortal hatred, ever since his Severity in the Affair of Constantine. They immediately flocked together, to the Number of twenty thousand, with a Resolution to execute the King's Orders without Mercy. Mean time, some of the chief Citizens dreading the Consequences of so rash an Order, went and advised with the Bishop of Winchester, who told them, let what would follow, the King must be obeyed. But the Remonstrances of the Earl of Chester to the King himself, had a better Effect. He represented to him, that such a tumultuous Assembly might be very dangerous, and raise in the City a Sedition which might not be easily appeased. Moreover he intimated, that so violent an Action would be blamed by all the World, and especially by Foreigners; who, not being prejudiced, like the English, against the Party accused, would think it very strange, he should be thus treated, since other means were not wanting to punish him if he were guilty. In fine, he put him in mind of the Pope's Rementment, who would never suffer the Sacredness of the Sanctuary to be violated with Impunity (1). Henry being prevailed with by these Reasons, sent a countermand to the Mayor of London, who found it very difficult to disperse the Mob.

Of all Hubert's Friends during his Prosperity, there was but one left that ventured to speak in his behalf. This was the Archbishop of Dublin, who, by his Solicitations, obtained of the King, that he would grant Hubert a longer time (2) to prepare his Answer. In the interim, Hubert coming out of his Sanctuary, to visit his Wife at St. Edmund's-bury, the King, who had notice of it, caused him to be pursued by some Soldiers, who found him in a small Chapel (3), where he had taken Refuge, with the Cross in one Hand, and the Host in the other: Both which being violently wrung from him, they chained his Feet (4) under his Horse's Belly, and in that ignominious manner conducted him to the Tower of London. All Churches, as well as what belonged to them, being in those Days so many Sanctuaries, not to be violated without Punishment, the King's Attempt alarmed the whole Body of the Clergy. The Bishop of London was no sooner informed of the Matter, but he went to the King, and declared he would excommunicate all those that, directly or indirectly, were concerned in the Breach of the Church's Privileges. The King being terrified at these Threats, ordered Hubert to be sent back to the Chapel (5) from whence he was forced, but commanded withal the Sheriffs of Hertfordshire and Essex, upon pain of being hanged, to guard the Church so strictly, that the Prisoner might neither Escape, nor receive Victuals from any Person. The Archbishop of Dublin perceiving his Friend could not long remain in this Situation, interceded for him once more, and intreated the King with Tears in his Eyes, to tell him what he designed to do with the Prisoner. Henry replied, he intended to have him condemned for a Traytor, unless he would own himself guilty, and abjure the Kingdom for ever.

Hubert thinking this Condition too hard, voluntarily yielded himself to the Sheriffs, who carried him to the Tower fettered and chained, amidst the Shouts of the People, who took a Pleasure in insulting over his Disgrace.

But whilst he was anxiously expecting the rigorous Sentence he was threatened with, his Affairs began to have a new Face by the fickle Temper of the King, who could not long continue in the same Mind. Two Things farther contributed to this Change. First, the Death of the Earl of Chester (6), professed Enemy of Hubert, though he disapproved of the illegal ways the King would have taken to destroy him. Secondly, a large Sum of Money lodged by the Prisoner in the Hands of the Knights Templars, and readily delivered by him to the King upon demand. Thus Hubert saw the King's Anger cool by degrees, when he expected to feel the most terrible Effects of his Displeasure. This sudden Change alarmed the Bishop of Winchester, who, dreading the revival of the King's Affection for his old Minister, made a fresh Attempt to complete the Destruction of his formidable Rival. He took occasion from the Money, lodged with the Templars, to accuse him of Fraud and Rapine; alleging, it was impossible to heap up such immense Riches by lawful means. This Charge was supported by all Hubert's Adversaries, who, seeing the King began to relent, came in a body and petitioned his Death. But the King resolutely answered, he would never consent to the Death of a Person, from whom himself and the King has taken so much received such signal Services (7). He ceased therefore his Prosecution, and leaving him in possession of his Estate of Inheritance, and of such Lands as he had purchased with his own Money, was contented with depriving him of the rest. As soon as it was known how the King stood affected, some of the Lords (8), who till then had not dared to speak for Hubert, solicited the King in his behalf, and so far prevailed, that he was sent to the Castle of the Devises, till it should please the King to dispose of him otherwise. Thus ended this Affair, which had made so much Noise, to the great Grief of the Bishop of Winchester, who expected Hubert would not have come off without the loss of his Head.

John Blund (9), Professor of Divinity at Oxford, being elected Archbishop of Canterbury, immediately set out for Rome, with the King's License, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation.

It seemed, that Hubert's Disgrace should have obliged the new Minister to keep within the Bounds of Moderation, and behave gentler to the English. But contrary to every one's Expectation, it had quite another Effect. Instead of taking a different Course from that of his Predecessor, the Bishop of Winchester thought only of governing with an absolute Power, and withal to screen himself from the Plots of those that should oppose his Designs. He intimated to the King, "that among the Barons there were few, really devoted to his Service, and that their sole Aim was to make themselves independent." Adding, "it was absolutely necessary to think of means to repress their Insolence: But it would be almost impossible to succeed, whilst they were, in a manner, Masters of the Kingdom, by having in their hands all the Places of Trust and Profit, in a word, whilst they possessed what might most increase their Audaciousness: That their Power therefore was to be undermined by degrees, by turning them out of their Posts, Offices, and Governments, which might be conferred upon Foreigners who should be invited into England, to the end the King might rely on their Assistance in case of Necessity: That the strong Places and Posts which gave most Credit and Authority with the People, being in the hands of such, as were by Gratitude and Interest devoted to the King, it would be in vain for the English Barons to attempt the re-establishment of their pretended Rights." This Advice so conformable to the King's Inclinations, could not but be very agreeable, and therefore was immediately put in practice. Quickly after were seen to arrive above two thousand Knights, Gascons and Poitevins, whom the Bishop of Winchester, their Countryman, and Peter de Rivaulx his Son, who passed for his Nephew, had sent for. These Strangers not only were promoted to the most considerable Posts and Governments (10), but moreover had the Wardships of the young Nobility committed to them by the King. By that means they procured one another very advantageous Matches, to the great Detriment of all the noble Families. This Proceeding very much exasperated the Barons, who plainly saw the Consequences. Besides, they could not bear to see themselves removed from Places and Posts, to which they had a Right to pretend, whilst the King lavished his Favours on Foreigners. But the Bishop of Winchester prevented their Murmurs from reaching the Ears of the King: Or, if he could not avoid it, had the Address to hinder their making any Impression on his Mind.

Richard Earl of Pembroke, first ventured openly to complain of these Proceedings (11). He boldly represented to the King, that in placing his whole Confidence in Strangers, he so alienated the Affection of his Subjects, that in the end, their Discontent must be attended with fatal Consequences. He plainly told him, in case he continued thus to prefer the Foreigners before the English, the Barons would be forced to seek means to clear the Kingdom of these Blood-suckers. The Prime Minister, who was present, did not give the King time to reply. He told the Earl, his Insolence deserved Correction, in thus pretending to abridge the King of the Liberty of employ-ding, if the Foreigners, now in the Kingdom, were not sufficient to reduce his rebellious Subjects to their Duty, a greater Number should be sent for. This haughty and impudent Answer caused a general Discontent among the Barons. From thenceforward they began to withdraw from Court, and form a Confederacy, to put a stop to the despotic Power the King was assuming by the violent Counsels of his Minister.

Some time after, the King summoning a Parliament (1), the Barons, pursuant to a Resolution taken among themselves, refused to meet. They were summoned a second time (2), but to no purpose. At last, being informed that a fresh Troop of Foreigners were landed in England, to strengthen the Court-Party, they met in a Body, to consult together what was to be done. The Result of their Consultation was to send Deputies to the King, to let him know, that if he removed not from his Person and Counsels, the Bishop of Winchester and the Poitevins, they were resolved to place on the Throne a Prince, who should better observe the Laws of the Realm. So formal a Declaration furnishing the Prime Minister with a plausible Pretext to exasperate the King against the Barons, he omitted nothing to induce him to use the most violent Measures to reduce them to Obedience. Henry blindly giving himself up to the Guidance of the Bishop, began to practise this Advice, with compelling some of the Lords to deliver their Children as Pledges of their Allegiance (3). After that, he prepared, very unadvisedly, to prosecute by Arms such as refused to submit. When he thought himself in a condition to make himself feared, he called a Parliament (4), with Design to cause the most obstinate to be condemned. The Barons obeyed the Summons indeed, but came so well attended, that they were in danger of no violence. The Earl of Pembroke was on the Road in order to be present with the rest, imagining it was not in the King's Power to have any thing passed to his Prejudice. But upon Notice (5) that the Court designed to take a speedier and surer Course, he turned back and retired into Wales. The Precautions of the Barons breaking the King's Measures, he perjured the Parliament, least what he had projected should fall on himself. His Design of causing the Parliament to proceed against the Barons not succeeding, he resolved to act with open Force. To that end, he summoned all the Vassals of the Crown to meet him with their Troops at Gloucester (6), but the Earl of Pembroke, and some others (7), did not think fit to obey. Their Refusal furnishing him with a plausible Reason to attack them, he ordered their Estates to be plundered, their Parks to be destroyed, their Houses to be pillaged, and their Spills to be distributed among his Poitevins. If the Barons had held together, the King would never have ventured to proceed to such Violence. But Dissension arising among them some broke the Confederacy (8), and left the rest exposed to the King's Resentment. The Earl of Pembroke perceiving himself too weak to resist, after being deserted by the greatest part of his Associates, applied to Llewellyn, Prince of Wales, who granted him his Protection and Assistance.

Mean time, Henry having received a fresh Supply of Poitevin Troops, marched as far as Hereford, with design to seize the Earl of Pembroke's Castles in that County. But his ardour quickly abated, by the resistance he met with from the first Castle he besieged. As he was losing his time before the Castle, he bethought himself of a Device which succeeded. He feigned to be willing, to refer the Decision of his Quarrel with the Barons to the Parliament, which was to meet in October. Nay, he gave his Royal Word, that he would consider of their Complaints; and as his past Conduct had rendered his Word doubtful, some of the Bishops became Sureties for the Performance of his Promises. Then he required the Castle, he was besieging, to be surrendered to him, promising to restore it to the Earl of Pembroke, within fifteen Days. These Conditions being approved of, the Castle was delivered to the King: but when the fifteen Days were expired, he laugh'd at the Earl's Credulity, and refused to stand to his Engagement. Such were the Instructions taught him by the Bishop of Winchester. I mean, not to value the Breach of his Faith, and to behave so, as to oblige his Subjects to require Pledge for the Performance of his Word.

The Parliament meeting on the 9th of October, the King was agreed, the King was earnestly intreated by all the Lords, to replace his Confidence in his Ministers. It was remonstrated to him, that the Administration of the publick Affairs belonged more naturally to the Lords of the Realm, than to Foreigners, and that he could not prefer Strangers without wronging his Barons. Above all things, he was desired not to introduce the penar-Custom of treating as Rebels and Traytors, those that were not legally condemned. The Bishop of Winchester, who, on such occasions, never failed to answer for his Master, replied so, as plainly showed what Maxims he instilled into the young King. He told them, The Peers of England were very arrogant to put themselves upon a Level with the Peers of France, when there was a wide Difference between the one and the other. Adding, it was a notorious Incroachment upon the Royal Prerogative, to pretend to deprive the King of the Right of making use of what Judges he pleased, to punish the Disobedient. Upon these words, which contained Maxims so destructive of Liberty, the Bishops unanimously threatened the Prelate with Excommunication. But he despised their Menaces, alleging, he was not subject to their Jurisdiction, as having been consecrated by the Pope. However, least this Reason should be deemed too light, he appealed before-hand to his Holiness, from the Sentence of the Bishops. Appeals to the Court of Rome were then so sacred, that the Bishops not daring to excommunicate him by Name, were contented to dart their Thunders in general, upon all those who alienated the King's Affection from his natural Subjects.

Mean time, the Earl of Pembroke finding all his Instances for the Restoration of his Castle were fruitless, besieged and took it in a few Days. Upon News thereof, the King fell into a great Fury with the Earl, and commanded the Bishops to excommunicate him. But he had the Mortification to be denied. They told him, they did not see lawful Cause to excommunicate the Earl, who had only recovered his own Right, and what the King promised to restore. Henry, not being able to prevail with the Bishops, resolved to take Arms again, and revenge this Affront. For that purpose, he summoned all the Lords to meet him at Gloucester with Hosts and Arms, the Day after All-Saints. When his Army was ready, he marched into Wales, but was no longer there, than he found himself in extreme want of Provisions and Forage, the Earl of Pembroke having had waste all the Places through which the Royal Army was to pass. This Disappointment obliging him to alter his Course, he entered Monmouthshire, where he staid some time Orders for the Subsistence of his Army. Mean time, the Earl of Pembroke, understanding that the King and most of the general Officers were lodged in the Castle of Glosin, whilst the Army was quartered without, in Tents, attacked the Camp by Night, and put the whole Army, who thought nothing of the matter, to rout. This Accident so confounded the King, who in the Action five or six hundred Hofs (9), with almost all his Baggage; that, though his Army was superior to the Earl's, he retired to Gloucester (10). Perceiving, upon the King's Retreat, resolved to besiege the Castle of Monmouth, commanded by Baldwin de Goupi, a French Officer of great Reputation. Baldwin resisting, but the Earl would approach with a small Number of Soldiers to take a view of the Castle, laid an Ambush for him, which surrounding him on a sudden, took him Prisoner (11). This Accident would doubtless have proved the Ruin of the Earl and his whole Party, if, by an unexpected good Fortune, as he was carried to the Castle, Baldwin had not been desperately wounded by an Arrow. His Wound obliging his Men to halt, in order to assist him, the Earl's Army had not only time to rescue their General, but likewise to kill or take Prisoners all that came out of the Town.

Whilst these things passed in Wales, Hubert de Burgh was contriving means to free himself from a new Danger which hung over his Head. He had received notice that the Bishop of Winchester intended to make away with him, and to compass his ends the more easily, earnestly desired of the King the Custody of the Castle of the Devizes. Hubert's Danger obliging him to endeavour to avoid it, he was so fortunate as to gain some of his Guards, who gave him an opportunity to escape (1), and take refuge in a neighbouring Church. When his Escape was known, the Governor ordered him to be pursued by some of the Garrison, who finding him before the Altar, dragged him thence with great Violence, and brought him back to the Castle. If he had been taken any where but in a Church, few would have concerned themselves about it. But the Breach of the Privilege of Sanctuary appeared to the Clergy of so dangerous a Consequence, that the Bishop of Salisbury made it his own Cause; for this Outrage was committed in a Church within his Diocese. He forthwith repaired to the Devizes, and tried to persuade the Governor, to send back the Prisoner to the Place from whence he was taken. His Solicitations proving ineffectual, he excommunicated the whole Garrison, and immediately carried his Complaints to the King. He was assisted by the Bishop of London, and some other Prelates, who were so urgent with the King, that he ordered the Prisoner to be sent to his Sanctuary. But this Favour was of little benefit to Hubert, since withal the King commanded the Sheriff of the County, to prevent any one from bringing him Viaticals. However, on the Morrow he was rescued by a Troop of armed Men, who afforded him means to make his Escape into Wales, where he joined the Earl of Pembroke.

The Election of John Bland to the See of Canterbury, not meeting with Approbation at Rome (2), the Pope declared it void. But for fear the Monks should mistake again, he empowered them to chuse Edmund, Canon of Salisbury. Thus by degrees the Pope became Masters of the Elections of the Archbishops of Canterbury, by annulling them, till those they intended to favour, were chosen.

After the King's Retreat, the Earl of Pembroke continued his Progress, and daily gained some Advantage. In the beginning of the Year 1234, he defeated a small Army commanded by John de Monmouth, who thought to surprize him, but was himself surprized. After this Victory, he ravaged the Lands of the King's Counsellors (3), lying in the Marches of Wales, and burnt the Town of Shrewsbury, whilst the King, who was still at Gloucester, durst not take the Field. Instead of opposing the Earl's Progress, he thought himself unsafe at Gloucester, and therefore took himself up in Winchester, leaving the Counties near the Severn to the Mercy of the Enemy. Several Bishops and others advised him to make Peace with the Earl. But this weak Prince, suffering himself to be entirely governed by the Bishop of Winchester, refused to hearken to any Accommodation, unless the Earl of Pembroke would come and throw himself at his Feet (4), and declare himself a Traytor. It was difficult to bring the Earl to submit voluntarily to these hard Terms: And it was no less so, to compel him, since the King had not the least Hopes of obtaining any Aids from the Parliament, to continue a War so disagreeable to all. But the Bishop of Winchester had a Refuge, of which he did not think fit to inform the King. As the Council consisted only of his Creatures, it was easy to engage them in a Means used by him to execute his Designs. He caused to be directed to the King's Officers in Ireland an Order, signed by twelve Privy Counsellors, to plunder the Estates of the Earl of Pembroke, and to take him dead or alive, if he should come into that Country (5). To this Order was added a Promise, in the King's Name, of the Earl's confiscated Lands in Ire- land, if they would faithfully execute what was enjoined them. The Governors of Ireland, allured by so fine a Bait, promised to use their utmost Endeavours, to content the King. But they wished to be secured by a Charter in form, of what was promised them. The Bishop, being too far engaged to recede, caused a Charter to be drawn, and found means to get it signed by the King, among other Papers of little Moment. Then, he caused the Great Seal to be affixed by the Chancellor, who, probably, was in the Plot (6). As soon as the Irish Governors received this Charter, they began to execute the Order. For that purpose they levied an Army on some pretence, and entering the Lands of the Earl of Pembroke, committed great Outrages, in order to draw him into Ireland. This Artifice had all the Success the Bishop of Winchester expected. Pembroke, exasperated at the Injuries done him in Ireland, immediately repaired thither (7) with design to take Vengeance of those who thus wantonly attacked him. But instead of being revenged, he was basely betrayed by pretended Friends, who engaged him in a Battle where he lost his Life (8), by a stab in the Back with a Dagger (9).

Whilst the Bishop of Winchester was thus using the King's Authority, without his Knowledge, to free himself from his Enemies, the new Archbishop of Canterbury was secretly labouring to undermine him. This Prelate, out of Zeal for the Good of the Publick, and for the King himself, never ceased representing, that it was his Interest to remove from his Person a Minister so odious to all his Subjects. He intimated to him, that the Foreigners who alienated his People's Affection, would infallibly prove one day the Cause of his Ruin. His Instances were so urgent, that at length Henry's Eyes were opened, and he seemed wholly disposed to reform his Conduct. The first Effect of this Change was the Disgrace of the Prime Minister, who had express Orders to return to his Diocese. After that, Peter de Rivaulx, the Treasurer; Segrave, the Justiciary; Robert de Passleu, and all the rest of the Favourite Strangers, promoted by the Bishop of Winchester to the principal Posts in the State, were shamefully turned out. At the same time, they were ordered to prepare to give an account of their Management, and of all the Money that had passed through their Hands.

The Affairs of the Court being thus settled, the King sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Bishops of Chesler and Rocheſter, into Wales, to negotiate a Peace with Llewellyn, which they concluded to the Advantage of the State.

The King's happy Change restored Tranquillity to England, from whence it had been some time banished. In all likelihood the Kingdom would have recovered its former Splendor, if the Prince who governed it had continued all along in the same Dispositions. Mean time, the new Ministers improved this good Interval, to make the King sensible of the Injury he had done himself, in placing his whole Confidence in Strangers, who had no Affection for himself or his Kingdom. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who was informed of the Particulars of the Plot against the Earl of Pembroke, shewed him a Copy of the Order and Charter sent by the Bishop of Winchester into Ireland. Henry, amazed at so great a Presumption, protested, he had no hand in the Matter. Nay, he seemed to grieve for the Death of the Earl of Pembroke, and to be extremely incensed against his Ministers, who had so notoriously abused his Confidence (10).

The Day appointed for the old Ministers to give in their Answers (11) being come, the Parties accused, who doubtless were conscious they had nothing to say for themselves, chose to take Sanctuary in Churches, under pretence of being justly apprehensive of some Violence from their Enemies. The Aim of the new Ministers, being to convince the King of the Unfaithfulness of the Old, they ordered it so, that the King removed the Pretence for their Non-appearance, by granting them a Safe-Conduct. Peter de Rivaulx, who appeared first, talked in so arrogant a Manner, and so little suitable to his

While these domestic Affairs were transacting, the Truce with France being expired, Lewis vigorously attacked the Duke of Bretagne. According to the Rules of good Policy, this Ally should have been powerfully assisted. But Henry was contented with sending sixty Knights, and two thousand Foot. An Aid, so disproportioned to his Wants, not being sufficient to protect him, he saw himself under a Necessity of demanding a three Months Truce. Which however he could not obtain, but on condition, that if within that time the King of England did not come in Person to his relief, he should submit to whatever would be required of him. During this Interval, he used his utmost Endeavours to prevail with Henry to come into Erdectz, but not succeeding, he did still H. name to Lewis for all Territories, which made his Subjects give him the Nick-name of Maulerick, that is, bad Servant (1). Thus, by his Negligence, Henry lost an Ally, who might have been of great Service to him, in his War with France (A).

1236. In the beginning of the next Year, Segrave and Paf- leur, the King's old Ministers, found means to make their Peace by a Prefent of a thousand Marks each, for which they were discharged from further Profession.

Shortly after (5) was solemnized the Marriage of Ifabella, the King's Sister, with the Emperor Frederic II (6). Tho' it was not customary to grant the King an Aid for the Marriage of a younger Sister, the Parliament was so well pleased with his late Proceedings, that they granted him two Marks on every Plough-land.

The Bishop of Winchester, who, since his Disgrace kept within his Diocese, departed from thence by the Pope's Order, who sent for him to be near his Person, on pretence he wanted his Advice in a Quarrel between him and the Citizens of Rome. It was not at all doubted, but the Pope used this Expedient to free him from the King's Protections; and probably, the Prelate paid dearly for this Favour. He had to deal with a Pope who neglected no opportunity to heap up Money. This is evident from a Proceeding of his this same Year. The ten Year's Truce, made by Frederic with the Saracens, being now almost expired, he caused a fresh Crusade to be published, as if he intended to make a vigorous Push to restore the Affairs of Palestine. Upon this News, the Zeal of the Christians being roused, great Numbers took the Cross. But whilst they were preparing to depart, another Bull appeared, to dispense with their going for a certain Sum of Money.

Enged being then in profound Tranquillity, Henry took this opportunity to espouse (7) Eleanor, second Daughter of Raymond Earl of Provence (8). The Nuptials were celebrated with great Magnificence and Rejoycings, which seemed to preface to the King more Happiness than this Marriage was attended with. The Solemnity of the Wedding and Coronation (9) of the new Queen being over, the King called a Parliament at Merton, where divers Statutes were enacted, which long remained in force, but are now for the most part repealed (10).

The War renewed by the King of France, ended with his Expedition into Bretagne, without any Treaty of Peace between the two Crowns. Henry, who was not of a martial Temper, had done nothing towards continuing it, and the Queen-Regent of France was very glad not to draw the English into France, during the Minority of the King her Son.

But, though England was not troubled with foreign Wars, the Kingdom was however afflicted at home by the contentions of the Nobility, upon the Promises of a new Law, the new Law, This was William of Provence, the Queen's Uncle (13), elected Bishop of Aleaze, but not yet confirmed by the Pope. This Prelate, lately arrived in England, had to gain the King's Affection, that nothing was done but by his Advice, and the Administration of the publick Affairs was entirely left to him. So great favour was very displeasing to the English Barons, who were reduced to the same Condition, from whence they thought to have freed themselves by the Expulsion of the Papists. At a Parliament, assembled this Year in April (14), they to boldly complained of these Proceedings to the King, that he thought fit to retire to the Tower, where he would have had the Barons to follow him. But finding none came to him, he returned of his own accord into the City, and endeavoured to satisfy them upon some of their Grievances, in order to induce them to overlook what they deemed the principal. He removed several Sheriffs who abused their Authority, and substituted others in their room. The Prince his Brother complaining of one Richard M. Priu Sward, for shewing him some disrespect, obtained that Sward should be banished the Realm, for his Insolence. In short, by some Changes at Court, to gratify the Barons (15), the King imagined they were pleased. But desiring to take this occasion to remove the Bishop of Chichester from the Chancellorship, in which Office he had worthily behaved, he had the Mortification to find, he refused to resign it. To justify his Refusal, he alleged, That he had been entrusted with that Office by the Parliament, and therefore could not quit it but by the same Authority.

Though the Parliament granted the King a considerable Aid, for the Marriage of the Empress his Sister, it appeared the Money was not put to that use. For Ambassadors from Frederic came to Court, to demand the Portion promised their Master. If People's Reflections on this occasion were not to the King's Advantage, those they had cause to make soon after upon his Incontinency, were no less prejudicial to his Reputation. All on a sudden, when there seemed to be least reason to expect it, he recalled to Court Segrave and Rivauxs, whom a little before he had prosecuted for their Misdemeanours. Not content with this, he entirely trusted them again, as if he had reason to be satisfied with their former Conduct. These pernicious Ministers were hardly reitired to their Posts, but the ill Effects of their Counsels on the King's Mind were perceived. In a Parliament, held this Year in June (14), at Winchester, Henry, by virtue of a Bull from Rome, would have annulled all his Grants during his Nonage, because they wanted the Pope's Confirmation. This frivolous Pretence plainly shewed, how indolently he laboured to enlarge himself more and more to the Court of Rome, instead of endeavouring to throw off its Yoke. A Proceeding so directly contrary to the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, being looked upon with Indignation, the Parliament refused to consent to the Revocation of these Grants, chiefly because of the Bull, upon which the King's Motion was grounded.

As Henry's conduct drew upon him the Contempt of ^{the French} his Subjects, this Contempt proved very prejudicial to him, ^{in 1644} with respect to foreign Princes. They considered him as no formidable Neighbour, since he could not be sure of his People's Affiance in case of need. On the other hand, his own Knowledge how his Subjects stood affected towards him, obliged him to use all possible Precautions to avoid a War with his Neighbours. He chose rather to give way to them voluntarily, than involve himself in 1236. Troubles, from which he saw he could not free himself with Honour. For this reason he had deserted the Duke of Bretagne, and suffered himself to be bullied this very Year by the King of Scotland, who demanded the County of Northumberland, with that haughtiness as would have met with a mortifying Repulse, had he been to deal with any other Prince (1). But how unjust forever this Pretension appeared, Henry made no scruple to purchase a Peace with the yearly Pension of eighty Marks, which were settled on the King of Scotland. He even took a Journey to York, on purpose to negotiate this dishonourable Treaty, pretending a fear of the Scots making a League with the Welsh. He feigned also to be apprehensive that Gilbert Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, who had succeeded his Brother Richard, and married the King of Scotland's Sister, would improve this opportunity to raise Commotions in the Kingdom (2).

Troubles

1237. Mean time, as the King daily perceived the great Men to be estranged from him, and that therefore it would be difficult to raise Money to fill his empty Coffers, he betought himself of an Expedient, which he believed could not fail of Success. He called a Parliament, to which all the Lords of the Kingdom were summoned (3), in order to treat about some weighty Affairs of State. As soon as they were met (4), a certain Priest, famed for Eloquence (5), told the Lords, "He was commanded to acquaint them with the occasion of their Meeting." After a short Pause, he added, "That the King having seriously reflected on the Abuses crept into the Government, was extremely concerned for contributing to the same, by his Carelessness and ill Conduct: That he acknowledged, with Grief, he had made use of imprudent and selfish Ministers, who, never regarding the Good of the Kingdom, to which they were Strangers, had drawn him in by their pernicious Counsels, to do Things contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Realm: That to repair, as far as was possible, the Evils occasioned by his own Indifference, and the unfaithfulness of his Ministers, he was determined to be guided no more by the Advice of Foreigners, but to commit the Administration of the Publick Affairs to his native Subjects: That he was persuaded, they would labour to the utmost of their Power to prevent the Oppression of the People, cause Justice and the Laws to flourish, and restore the Crown to its former Lustre." After laying these Foundations, the Orator continued, "That the King desired his Parliament to consider, that the Mismanagement of his Treasury, and the Debts he had contracted, were not the least of the Misdemeanours, his Ministry might be charged with: That he hoped they would begin with applying a Remedy to this, upon his Assurance, that he would consent to any Expedients proposed for the redress of the other Abuses: That therefore he required an Aid answerable to his present occasions, and to those he was in earnest, he consented beforehand, that Commissioners should be appointed to take care that the Money should be disposed of for the necessary Uses of the Kingdom." If Henry had been less known, this harangue might have had a sudden Effect on the Parliament. But as they were too sensible to what a height he could carry his Diffimulation, all these submissive Expressions were not able to move them. They answered, "They had often granted Aids to the King, without ever receiving any reciprocal Mark of his Affection: that since his Accession to the Crown, his Dominions were considerably lessened, though he had frequently exacted from his Subjects very large Sums, which were only lavished away upon Foreigners." To this vigorous Answer, it was replied from the King, "That his own and his Sister's Marriage had entirely exhausted his Treasure; but if they would grant him a Thirteenth (6) Part of their Moveables, he promised, upon his Honour, never to injure or oppress any Baron of the Realm." The Lords were not prevailed with by this Promise, which seemed to them of little Moment, since they could not rely upon the King's Word. And therefore they replied, They had already granted the King an Aid for the Empress's Marriage, but he had diverted it to other Uses, and since he had married without asking their Advice, he might defray the Expences of his Wedding as he pleased. This Answer, convincing him, that he wanted a stronger Engine to wrest from them the Aid he demanded, he attacked them in a more sensible Part. He promised to re-establish his Father's Charters, and to satisfy them that he really intended to cause them to be observed, he ordered the Execration formerly denounced by Cardinal Langton upon the Transgressors of these Charters, to be published in all the Churches. In short, to gain them entirely, he added to his Council three Lords (7) whom he knew to be very acceptable to the Nobility. So many Advances from a Sovereign, and especially the Re-establishment of the Charters, had at length the desired Effect. The Parliament suffering themselves to be deceived by these pretended Demonstrations, granted him the Aid required (8). However they clogged it with two not very grateful Conditions. First, that, for the future, he should reject the Counsels of the Foreigners, and adhere to the Advice of his Subjects. Secondly, that four Knights should be chosen in every County to collect and secure the Money in some Monastery, that it might be restored to every one again, in case the King should break his Word. Notwithstanding this Precaution, the Money was no sooner raised, but the King seized it and squandered it away in useless Expences, even in Presents to his favourite Foreigners, who remained in his Council as before.

Henry's Conduct occasioned such loud Murmurs, that Richard's Brother thought himself obliged, to represent to him very strongly, to what Danger it would infallibly expose him. But his Remonstrances were in vain, Henry liking better the Counsels of the Foreigners, which were more agreeable to his Inclinations. Among those that had the greatest Ascendant over the King, History particularly mentions Simon de Montfort, Son of the famous Earl of Montfort, General of the Crusade against the Albigenses. This young Man, who, for some Disgrace, had left the Court of France to make his Fortunes in England, conformed himself to the King's Humour, that few were in greater Favour. I shall have frequent occasion to speak of him, in the Course of this Reign, under the Title of Earl of Leicester.

Though Henry little thought of extending his Dominion over the neighbouring Countries, a happy Juncture procured him, before the end of this Year, an Advantage which the most illustrious of his Predecessors had fought in vain. Lewellyn, Prince of Wales, grown old and infirm, and finding himself persecuted by his Son Griffin, could think of no better means to secure himself from his rebellious Practices, than by putting himself under the King of England's Protection; to whom he did Homage for his Dominions. This Proceeding was the more extraordinary, as he himself, as well as his Ancestors, had all along exerted their utmost to prevent the acknowledging of this Sovereignty. If Force of Arms had at any time compelled them to it, they had always been ready to disown their Submission, when their Circumstances were more favorable.

Whilst the English were loudly complaining of being exposed to the Avarice of the King and his foreign Ministers, a fresh Cause of Discontent unexpectedly happened by the Arrival of Otto the Pope's Legate, who was come to plunder them of what they had left. The Clergy justly dreaded these extraordinary Legateships, the sole Aim whereof was to pillage them. The Archbishop of Canterbury very much blamed the King, for suffering the Legate to come into the Kingdom, without any apparent Necessity, and without the Knowledge of the Clergy and Parliament. But these Expostulations were in vain. It would not only have been difficult to persuade the King to send back the Legate, but it even appeared that he himself had privately sent for him. His View was to screen himself, under his Protection, from the Attempts of his Subjects. The Pope took care not to lose this Opportunity of sending a Legate into England, in expectation, that by means of the King's Authority, he might with Impunity rifle the Churches. Thus the English saw themselves at once exposed to the Avarice of the King and the Pope, who were united together for their Destruction.

It was not upon England alone that the Legate cast his Eyes: His Design was to drain Scotland also, which hitherto had been free from the Exactions of the Court of Rome. He believed he had met with an Opportunity at an Interview (9) which the Kings of England and Scotland

1237. had at York, on Account of the Scotch King's Pretensions. As soon as the Conference, where the King of Scotland obtained an Augmentation of his Pension (1), was ended, the Legate, who had found some Excuse to be present, told him he designed to go into Scotland, to regulate the Affairs of the Church. Alexander answered, he never heard of any Legate sent into Scotland, and there was still less occasion for any in his Reign; neither would he, in short, allow such an Innovation, as long as he sat on the Throne. Adding, if, notwithstanding this Declaration, he persisted in his Design, he warned him beforehand, that he was not absolute Master of his own Subjects, and perhaps it would not be in his Power to protect him, if the People, fierce and ungovernable, should fail in their Respect due to the Pope's Legate. These last Words were apparently the Reason of the Legate's altering his Mind, and staying with the King of England, whom he found more obsequious.

Birth of Henry, Son to the Emperor

About the same time, Henry received a Letter from the Emperor Frederic, informing him of the Birth of a Son by Isabella his Wife, to whom he had given the Name of Henry. Adding, he designed the Kingdom of Sicily for the new-born Prince.

Corruption of the Court of Rome
P. 438, 439.
Matthew Paris the Historian, concludes the Occurrences of this Year, with a lively Description of the Court of Rome. What he says is the less questionable, as it comes from the Pen of a cotemporary Monk. But however it is this which has gained him so many Enemies, who have laboured to render his Testimony dubious.

1238. Simon de Montfort before-mentioned, finding himself in great Favour at Court, ventured to cast his Eyes on the Countess Dowager of Pembroke, the King's Sister (3). But as he was justly apprehensive of meeting with great Obstacles, he took a shorter Method, by securing the Princess's Heart beforehand. In a word, he so managed his Matters, that the King was obliged to cause them to be privately married in his own Chapel (4). Prince Richard was extremely incensed at this Marriage (5). He bitterly complained of it to the King, and strongly remonstrated to him, that he was in the wrong to give his Sister to a younger Brother, whose Fortune was no way answerable to a Royal Family. The King excused himself in the best manner he could, from the Necessity of hastening the Marriage; adding, there was now no Remedy, since it was solemnized and the Princess with Child. Mean while, Montfort perceiving Prince Richard was highly exasperated against him, and fearing he would endeavour to annul his Marriage, went to Rome, where he found means to have it confirmed by the Pope. After that he returned to the King, who gave him a very kind Reception.

His Marriage
M. Paris.
This Marriage was not the only thing Richard thought he had reason to complain of. The great Credit of the Foreigners, who were always near the King, created in him no less Uneasiness than in the rest of the Barons. They all unanimously complained, that the King had violated his Promises, and that all the Money exacted from his People on divers Pretences, was employed only in enriching the Queen's Relations. As Prince Richard seemed to be very much concerned for the Interest of the Publick, they believed that, under such a Leader, it would not be impossible to obtain of the King the Satisfaction they required, especially with regard to the Foreigners. In this Belief, they entered into a Confederacy (6), and having the Prince at their head, sent the King word, that they prayed him to remember his Promises. This Confederacy, the Consequences whereof were dreaded by Henry, caused him to put on a seeming Moderation, as he usually did when he found himself pressed. Instead of shewing any Repentment, as they expected, he appointed a Day to give them a favorable Answer. But as they had been deceived more than once, they suffered not themselves to be over-reached by this outward Mildness. Persuaded as they were, that the King sought only to amuse them, they came to London on the Day appointed, guarded with Horse and Arms, and ready to compel the King to a Compliance. Henry took care not to omit, at a time when he saw no Power able to support him. He assured them he really intended to redress all Grievances, and to convince them of his Sincerity, told them, he was willing to submit to the Arbitration of a certain Number of Lords, the one half to be named by himself. This Proposal being approved, Commissioners were chosen on both Sides, who drew up certain Articles, which the King was to observe for the future, in the Government of the Kingdom. These Regulations were signed by the King and the Barons, and confirmed by the Legate, who, in all public Affairs, always endeavoured to interpose his Master's Authority.

This same Legate met not at Oxford, where he went upon some Business, with that Respect that was paid him at Court. Though the University in a Body received him with the Defiance due to his Character, the Insolence of his Domesticks was the occasion that certain Scholars lost the Respect they owed him. Some young Students offering to enter into his Lodgings (7), were so uncivilly repulsed by the Porter, that they were very much out of Humour. Whilst they were yet in the House, some of them going into the Kitchen, found there a poor Irish Scholar begging for Relief of the Cook, who instead of an Alms, threw a Ladle-full of boiling Water in his Face. This barbarous Action provoked a Welsh Student, who was witness of it, that having a Bow in his hand, he shot the Cook dead on the Spot with an Arrow. The Legate hearing of the Tumult, retired in a Fright into the Tower of the Church, where he remained till Night, dreading that the Insolence of the Scholars would even extend to his Person. As soon as he thought he might retire with Safety, he hastened to the King, and complained of this Outrage, laying it to the Charge of the whole University, which he had now put under an Interdict. The King appeared extremely enraged at this Insult upon the Legate, and to give him Satisfaction, immediately sent the Earl of Warren to Oxford, with orders to seize the Offenders (8). This Business, which at first made a great Noise, was at length hushed by the Mediation of the Bishops, who prevailed with the University to make all the Submissions he required (9).

Had this Accident happened a little later, England would have paid dearer for it. Shortly after, Henry sending the Emperor a Body of Troops, under the Command of Henry de Tarbeville (10), the Pope, against whom they were employed, was so incensed, that for a good while, the English Ecclesiastics were denied Admittance at the Court of Rome. This Quarrel made the Emperor hope, he should gain the King his Brother-in-law to his Side. Accordingly, being desirous to improve this Juncture, he dispatched Ambassadors to him, who did all that lay in their Power, to persuade him to join with the Emperor against the Pope; but it was not possible for them to succeed. The King and the Pope stood too much in need of each other, to remain long at variance. Though the Pope looked upon himself as Lord Paramount of England, he was not ignorant how averse the Barons were to his Pretensions, which the King's Authority in some measure was alone capable of supporting. Besides, it was only through the Countenance and Connivance of the King that he could rife the English Clergy with Impunity. On the other hand, Henry saw, none but the Pope could support him against the Barons. Moreover in his Design of filling the principal Church-Preferments with his Creatures, he was very sensible he could not proceed without the Pope's Authority. It was no wonder therefore, the King and the Pope held together, since it so greatly concerned them mutually to assist one another.

The Death of the Bishop of Winchester (11), during these Transactions, gave the King opportunity to make the first Advances towards a Reconciliation with the Pope. Henry was ardently desirous to procure this rich See for the Bishop of Valence his Uncle, strongly recommended him to the Monks, the Electors. But, notwithstanding his

He knew the Pope would not do more than to see him make Advances towards a Reconciliation. The Interest of the Court of Rome required it, and seldom does that Court neglect what may turn to its Advantage. In this belief, Henry sent Ambassadors thither, who, after making some Submissions in their Master's Name (1), prevailed to have the Election of the Bishop of Chichester annulled by the Apostolical Authority. The deceased Bishop of Wincheſter, was juſtly deemed one of the chief Authors of the Troubles in this Reign. It was he that adviſed the King to annul his Father's two Charters, and ſend for Foreigners into the Kingdom, to commit to them the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs. Theſe two Articles were a perpetual Occaſion of Diſcontent among the Nobles, and at length were attended with very fatal Conſequences. The Death of the tended this very fatal Consequences. The Death of this pernicious Counsellor was preceded by that of Jocanna, Queen of Scotland, Sister to Henry, (3)

The manner in which the Kingdom was governed, was difplicating to all. So that it was not strange, there should be People, who endeavour'd to make away with the King. This Year, a Villain (4), pretending to be mad, found means to get into his Chamber by Night (5), with design to kill him; but being disappointed by the King's passing that Night in the Queen's Apartment, he was taken and punished according to his Desert. Before he died, he declared that William de Moris (6) was the Author of the Conspiracy, in which several others were engaged. However, either out of Carelessness, or for some other Reason, there was no Inquiry made.

1310. I shall begin the Relation of the Occurrences of the Year 1239, with offering some Effects of Henry's Capriciousness and Inconstancy. The Knowledge of the Character and Genius of this Prince is absolutely necessary, for the better Understanding the Springs and Causes of what passed in this Reign. As he neither loved nor hated, but according to the Suggestions of those who had the Ascendant over him, it is no wonder he frequently altered his Inclinations and Maxims. He sometimes loaded with Favours and Careless, Persons who, within a few Days, found themselves in Disgrace ; and very often he retired to his Service, such as had been shamefully dismissed. I have already taken notice, that, after persecuting the Earl of Pembroke, he reſtored to Gilbert his Brother the Office of Earl-Marshal (?). Gilbert, thinking himself in the King's good Graces, was very much surprized, that one Day when he came to wait upon him, he was, contrary to Custom, denied entrance.
 He complained to the King himself, by one of his Friends, who prayed him to tell the Reason, why such an Affront was offered to a Lord of so great Distinction.
Henry replied, It was because Richard, the Earl's Brother, was a Traitor, and had continued in his Treason to his Death ; and therefore he repented of giving him the Office of Marshal, which however he could recall whenever he pleased. This Answer obliged the Earl to withdraw from Court, and retire into the North of England, to secure himself from the Plots of his Enemies, who had persecuted the King against him. (8).

Another Influence of this Prince's Infancy may be
 This: So far was he from resenting Simon de Monfort's Affection to the Royal Family, that he continued him in favour as before, and atlast made him Earl of Leicester (9).
 And yet, a few Days after, giving him this fresh Marriage, he publicly charged him with debauching his Sister, and bribing the Pope to confirm his Marriage. This Accusation could never be more unforable, since the time to prosecute him for this Action was pass'd; and besides, he had caus'd the Nuptials to be celebrated in his Presence, and in his own Chapel. The Earl, drawing the Effects of his Resentment, departed

that very Day with his Lady for France, who remained till the King's Displeasure was over.

I shall relate but one Instance more of the capricious Conduct of this Monarch, of which there are visible Proofs in almost all the Actions of his Life. He was not afraid, the Year before, to break with the Pope, by sending Succours to the Emperor. And yet, a few Months after, Frederic being filiously excommunicated, Henry ordered the Bull of Excommunication to be published in all the Churches of his Kingdom. This proceeding was thought the more France, because, as Brother-in-law to the Emperory, he might have pleaded in defence himself, or at least been so tardy, as to show it was done with regret.

This same Year the Queen was delivered of a Prince (1701) Birth of called Edward, who in process of Time succeeding his Father, proved one of the most illustrious Monarchs that M. P. in ever swayed the English Sceptre. N. W. P.

The Excommunications daily imposed by Otho the Legate upon the Churches, compelled the Bishops at length, to carry their Complaints to the Pope, who had twice his Letters recalled him; but the King had still opposed it. At last, the Prelates, tired with the perpetual Demands of the Cardinal, who daily invented new Pretences to plague the Clergy, resolved to meet and consider of some remedy for this Evil. They had scarce begun to treat of these Affairs, when the Legate came into the Assembly, and demanded an Aid for the pressing Occasions of the Holy See. This fresh Demand putting them beyond all patience, they plainly told him, They were determined to endure his Oppressions no longer; and to prevent any further Solicitations, broke up immediately. A Denial so peremptory, which should have convinced him how much the Clergy were disgusted, had no other Effect but to cause him to turn to the Religious Houses, who were forced to supply what the Bishops refused.

This Legate, like all the rest before him, was infatigable. After having, with Impunity, extorted large Sums from England, he had a mind to do the same in Scotland, though he had already been refused entrance. But he was not a Man to be discouraged at one Denial. For this purpose he departed, attended by some English Barons, without troubling himself first to obtain the King of Scotland's Consent. Upon his Arrival on the Borders, he was met by the King, not to do him Honour, but to hinder him from proceeding. This Opposition, which however he had reason to expect, offended him so, that in his Passion he threatened Alexander, who answered him in a softer Tone, and let him see, he did not value his Threats. They would have come to a downright Quarrel, if the English Lords had not interposed to make up the Difference. They prevailed at length with the King of Scotland, though not without great difficulty, to give the Legate leave for this once to enter into his Kingdom. But Alexander would not consent to it, but on condition that the Legate should acknowledge under his hand and Seal, that it was out of a particular Condescension for his Person, and that this Example should not be brought into Precedent. All Obstacles being removed, the Legate came to Edinburgh, where he exacted some Money from the Scotch Clergy, which was the sole End of his Journey.

If the Clergy of England had to deal with a greedy Cardinal, the rest of the King's Subjects were in no better case. Henry, who could not without great Difficulty obtain Subsidies of the Parliament (11), neglected no opportunity of extorting Money from private Persons, by all sorts of means. Hubert de Burgh, whom he had left un molested some Years, was prosecuted afresh, for the same Crimes, he was before charged with, and which were thought to be forgotten. This Cause was solemnly tried before an Assembly of the Barons, where it is said, he vindicated his Innocence by incontestable Proofs. However, as he had reason to dread a Sentence which might have exposed himself to the same Fate, he thought it the King his Father made the City of London the Wardens of the

pref. order. Hitherto he had found means to be continued through the King's Intercession. But now he did not think fit, to desire him to speak in his behalf. He knew the Pope was seized by a Distemper of which, probably, he would never recover: And therefore did not care to be in England, when the News of his Death should arrive (1). He had too much reason to fear, that during the Vacancy of the Holy See, the Money he had amassed, might be stopped. It is affirmed, he carried away more than he left to the Churches and Monasteries. Gregory IX. died quickly after, as the Legate foretold, and the Emperor immediately advised the King of it, that he might seize the Money levied on the Kingdom, for the deceased Pope; but the Legate had carried all with him. He was however so unfortunate in his return to Italy, as to fall into the hands of the Emperor's People, who stripped him of all his Riches. This was the Fruit of the numberless Oppressions and Extortions committed by this Cardinal in England. Thus the Money exacted on pretence of employing it against the Emperor, turned to the Emperor's own Benefit.

The death of Gregory IX. caused a Schism which lasted till the next Year. During this time, Raffi and Supine, whom the Legate left in England, as Nuncio's, continued their Extortions without Moderation or Justice. Supine being gone to Ireland, with the King's Permission, exacted from the Clergy there fifteen hundred Marks, a very large Sum at that time for a Country where Money was extremely scarce (2). So that the death of Gregory IX. brought but little Relief to the English, though they imagined they had reason to rejoice as at a great Deliverance, since no Pope had ever carried his Exactions to that height. The following Instance is a clear Evidence of what he was capable. Some time before his death he caused to be proposed to the Abbot of Peterborough, that if he would give him, under a borrowed Name, one of the Monastery's Livings of two hundred Pounds (3) a Year, he would farm it out to him at an hundred, and so they should share the Benefice between them. But the Abbot was too honest to agree to such a Bargain. He even acquainted the King with it, who being made sensible of the ill Consequences, hindered, by his Authority, the Abbot from being forced to comply. Had the Pope succeeded in this Project, all the Benefices in England would soon have been in the hands of the Pope, the Bishops, and the Abbots. At least, it is to be presumed Gregory would not have been satisfied with that, but designed it only as an Essay of a more general Project.

The Clergy were not the only Sufferers in England. The People were no less exposed to the King's Oppressions, than the Clergy to the Pope's. The Jews in particular were every now and then severely dealt with, for out of their Pockets it was that the King usually raised Money to defray his extraordinary Expenses. Thomas Earl of Salisbury, the Queen's Uncle, being come this Year into England, the King received him with such Magnificence, that not knowing how to provide Money for this Charge otherwise, he forced the Jews to present him with twenty thousand Marks, on pain of being expelled the Kingdom (4).

The King was so desirous of enriching the Queen's Relations, that he was never weary of shewing them Marks of his Affection. The Archbishop of Canterbury dying the last Year, as was observed, Henry used for many Instances, and other less lawful Means, that he got Boniface the Queen's Brother to be elected to the Archiepiscopal See. Thus was seen at the Head of the Church of England, a young Foreigner, ignorant of the Laws, Customs and Language of the Kingdom, and consequently incapable of discharging the Functions of that Dignity as he ought.

Gilbert, Earl of Pembroke, dying this Year (5), Walter his Brother demanded of the King the Investiture of the Office of Earl-Marshal, Hereditary in their Family. Henry at first in a great Passion denied him, alleging, his two Brothers were Traitors and Rebels, and that he himself was present at a Tournament contrary to his Commands. However, this Lord finding means to make the Queen his Friend, obtained at length what he desired (6).

The Affairs of the Welsh employed the King good part of this Year. Llewelyn, Prince of Wales, departing this Life in a very advanced Age, left two Sons, David and Griffin, who were to share his Inheritance. But David seized the whole, and moreover detained his Brother in Prison. Though, ever since the Homage voluntarily paid by Llewelyn, Henry might justly look upon Wales as a Fief of the Crown, he would not perhaps have concerned himself in this Affair, had he not been induced by Griffin's Wife. This Princess imploring his Protection, promised him in her Husband's Name, a Present of six hundred Marks, and an annual Tribute of three hundred, if he would free that Prince out of Prison, and put him in possession of his Right. Henry accepting this Offer, sent to David to release the Prisoner, and restore him the part of the Inheritance, threatening him, in case of refusal, with a fierce War, till he should obey (7). David not being able to resist at a time when many of his Subjects were inclined for his Brother, took, as he thought, a surer Course than that of Arms. He out-bid his Sister-in-law, and made more advantageous Proposals, which were accepted. As Henry had only a view to his own Interest, in granting his Protection to Griffin, he readily espoused the contrary Side, when he found his account in it. Accordingly, from Griffin's Protector, he turned his Enemy; and least that Prince should escape, he took upon him to see him safely confined in the Tower of London (8). Thus it was that this Prince made no Confidence of selling his Protection to the two opposite Parties, without troubling himself on which side Justice lay, or regarding his prior Engagements (9).

The same Year the Empress Isabella, the King's Sister, died in Child-bed. Her death was soon followed by that of Eleanor of Bretagne, who had been Prisoner forty Years in Bristol Castle. This Princess, though reduced to so M. Paris. M. W. H.

wretched a Condition, could never be brought, during her long Imprisonment, to recede in the least from her Right, in order to obtain some Favour which she could not expect upon any other Terms (10). Shortly after, Henry was engaged in a troublesome Affair, of which he got clear, as usually, with Dishonour, and which caused him to forfeit entirely the little Esteem his Subjects had still left for him. Before Prince Richard's Departure to the Holy-Land, he invested him with the Earldom of Poitou, though France was possessed of good part of it, since the Conquests of Philip Augustus. This Province being thus divided between the two Crowns, Louis thought likewise he had a Right to invest with it, his Brother Alphonse: which proved the occasion of a War between the two Monarchs.

Henry being extremely provoked at Louis's investing the Prince his Brother with Poitou, resolved to be revenged, and the more as the Queen his Mother was concerned. This Princess, who, after the Death of King John, espoused the Earl of Marche her first Lover, behaved with the same Haughtiness, she had assumed whilst Queen of England. As the Territories of the Earl her Spouse were in that part of Poitou possessed by France, he had all along done Homage to Louis. But when Alphonse became Earl of Poitou, she could not bear to see her Husband kneel to a Brother of the King of France. This was certainly a mistaken Pride, since there was a vast difference between the Sovereign and the Vassal. However, the solicited her Husband to earnestly, that at length she prevailed with him to refuse Homage to Prince Alphonse, though he had now positively promised it. This Refusal was even accompanied with some offensive Words, which put the King of France in a Passion, and made him resolve to chastise the Earl's Insolence. Mean time the Earl, maintaining what he had done, implored the Protection of the King of England. He hinted to him, it would be very easy to drive the French out of all Poitou; and in case he would bear the Expence of the War, that Province would supply him with Troops sufficient for a great Army. Henry pleaded to fill the vacant Benefices, which he disposed of in a scandalous Manner (1).

Whilst these things passed, an Accident happened, which broke the strict Union between the King and the Prince of Wales, ever since their Agreement. Griffin, who was confined in the Tower of London, endeavouring to escape out of the Prison-window, fell into the Ditch and broke his Neck. Whilst he was alive, his Brother David never dared to displease the King, for fear he should support him in his Pretensions. But when Griffin was dead, he made an Irruption into the Borders of England, under colour of being revenged for certain Breaches of the late Treaty. The Borderers upon Wales seeing the King took no care to repel this Insult, armed themselves in Defence of their Country; but as they were too weak, and ill-conducted, were continually defeated (2).

At the same time, Alexander II. King of Scotland, having lately married a French Lady (3), sent Henry word, he intended to do him Homage no longer for the Lands held of the Crown of England. How little inclined however Henry was for War, he could not help on this occasion, exerting himself, so greatly were the English incensed at this Bravado. He summoned therefore all the Vassals of the Crown to meet him at Newcastle (4). When Alexander resolved to refuse the Homage due to Henry, he did not expect it would have involved him in a War (6). Persuaded as he was of the Weakness and Irresolution of the Prince he had to deal with, he hoped the Difference would be decided as formerly, by a Negotiation which might turn to his Advantage. But when he saw the English Army ready to enter his Territories, he became more submissive, and sent Ambassadors to Newcastle to sue for Peace. Henry received the Proposal with Joy. Notwithstanding his seeming Resolution to push the War with vigour, he readily consented to a Treaty, which afforded him an excuse to lay down his Arms. Alexander submitted to the same Homage paid by himself and Ancestors, and a good Understanding between the two Kings was perfectly restored (7). Where they parted, a Marriage was agreed upon between Alexander's eldest Son of the same Name with himself, and Margaret, Henry's eldest Daughter.

The War

T. Wilson.

The Army raised for the War with Scotland, not having occasion to use, the King was advised to make use of it to reduce the Prince of Wales to Obedience. But instead of improving so favorable a Juncture, he dismissed the Troops (8), out of Impatience to call a Parliament, and demand an Aid of Money, which however he could not obtain (9). The Prince of Wales so little questioned Henry's using the means he had in his Power to chastise him, that, to free himself from the imagined danger, he applied to the Pope, intimating, that he was compelled to declare himself Vassal, and Tributary to the King of England. For which reason, he besought the Pope to annul the Treaty, offering to become Vassal to the Holy See, and to pay him the yearly Tribute of five hundred Marks (10). Innocent IV., being no less greedy of Money than his Predecessors, was pleased with this Proposal. However, to show he did not pretend to decide the Matter without a hearing of the Cause, and upon the bare Suggestion of a Petition, he empowered two Welsh Abbots to take Informations concerning the pretended Constraint alleged by their Prince. At the same time he commissioned them to annul the Treaty, and absolve the Prince of Wales from his Oath, in case it appeared, he had been really compelled. It was easy to foresee what Sentence the Judges would pass. The two Abbots, proud of their Power, instantly summoned the King of England to appear before them, as if he had been some private Person subject to their Jurisdiction. This Proceeding extremely enraged the King and his Council, as well as the whole Nation. Then they were sorry the Army was disbanded, but as there was no remedy, it was resolved, another should instantly be raised to chastise the Prince of Wales as soon as the Season would permit; for it was then the middle of Winter. At the same time, the great Men conferred together about means to stop the Attempts of the Court of Rome.

Whilst these two Affairs were in hand, the Court received Intelligence, that the King of France had sent away all the English in his Dominions. Though the Treaty was far from being yet expired, Leais thought fit to take this Step, to prevent the King of England's Success in France, from being too well informed of the Affairs of the Kingdom. To that end, he assembled at Paris all who had Estates in France, and desirous to them, he thought it not possible to serve faithfully two Masters at once, gave them their choice to prefer which they pleased. Those that declared for England, were ordered to depart out of France within such a time, with Assurance of retaining their Lands. Henry did not act with the same Justice. As soon as he was informed of Leais's Proceedings, he seized all the Lands held by the French in England, without any regard to the Remonstrances of the King of France. However, Leais did not think it to break the Truce for the sake of some private Persons (11).

Shortly after, the Emperor Frederic sent Ambassadors to Henry, complaining of the frequent Aids of Money given to the Pope. He ordered him to be told, for the future, he would treat no English that should fall into his hands as Enemies, since he could not deem them otherwise. His Complaint had no other Effect, than that the Clergy took occasion from thence to oppose the Exactions of the Court of Rome, whose continual Pretence was the War with the Emperor (12).

The beginning of the Year 1245 (13), the Queen was crowned at Winchester. I shall not have occasion to speak of this Prince before the end of this Reign.

The War with the Welsh, which was deferred till the Spring, was accordingly begun at that time (14). For the English proceeded with a little Vigour, that instead of attacking their Enemies, they were hardly able to defend themselves.

This was not so much owing to their Weakness, as to their being employed in other Affairs, which to them seemed of greater moment than the War with Wales. They at length resolved to free themselves from the Tyranny of the Court of Rome. Martin the Nuncio used his Authority with so little discretion, that it was not possible to bear it any longer. The Barons, who saw with grief all the Money of the Kingdom remitted to Rome, and were very sensible, the Clergy always gave way, when the Pope came to be opposed, were at last determined to exert their utmost to prevent such common Exactions. After frequent Conferences, they resolved to act by their own Authority. Accordingly, without waiting any longer for the King's Protection, who appeared very backward to second them, they issued out Orders to the Wardens of the Ports, to stop all Persons that should bring any Bulls or Mandates from the Court of Rome. Pursuant to these Orders, which were every where obeyed, without regarding whether they were approved by the King, a Messenger from Rome was seized with several Bulls about him, empowering the Nuncio to exact Money from the Clergy on divers Pretences. The Nuncio complained to the King, who commanded every thing that was seized to be restored to him. But the Barons strongly remonstrated to him, how much he wronged his Subjects in perpetually countenancing the Rapines of the Court of Rome. For his Conviction, they laid before him the true Value of the Income enjoyed by the Italian Ecclesiastics in England, amounting to sixty thousand Marks, per Annum, a Sum exceeding at that time the whole Revenue of the Crown (1). Henry, who had never made so exact a Calculation, could not help showing his Surprise. But as he durst not venture of himself to redress this Grievance, for fear of the Pope's Reintment, he was contented with permitting the Barons to write to the General Council then assembled at Lyons, to set forth the intolerable Oppressions which England suffered from the Court of Rome. Accordingly the Barons wrote to the Council in the Name of the whole Kingdom, inserting in their Letter, sent by Ambassadors on purpose, all the Grievances complained of by the English (2). But as they knew that on such occasions the Court of Rome never failed to make use of Delays and Evasions, they resolved to take a more speedy and effectual Course. For that purpose, they agreed to meet under pretence of a Tournament, in order to concert the necessary Measures for executing their Design. The King ordering the Consequences of this Assembly, forbid them to be present at the Tournament; but they did not think proper to obey. They met therefore at the Place appointed (3), and after some Conference, sent to the Nuncio a Knight (4), who commanded him in their Name, forthwith to depart the Kingdom. The Knight discharged his Commission somewhat roughly, and upon the Nuncio's demanding, who gave him this Authority? He answered, The whole Nation; and in case he staid three Days in England, he should infallibly be cut in pieces. Morton failed not to carry his Complaints to the King. But Henry, telling him, he was not able to protect him (5), he demanded a Pass-port, and went away immediately, to the great Satisfaction of all the People. The Pope, who had never met with such a Check in England, was so enraged, that he was heard to say: I see plainly I must make Peace with the Emperor, that I may humble these petty Princes: For the great Dragon being once appeased, I shall with more ease be able to crush the smaller Serpents.

Mean while, the English Ambassadors being arrived at Lyons, presented their Letter to the Council, where the Pope presided in Person. The Letter being publicly read, Innocent was so surpris'd, that he had not a word in his own Vindication. After the Ambassadors had waited some time to see if he had any thing to alledge against the Contents of the Letter, one of them gave a particular Narrative of the Grievances of their Nation. He dwelt chiefly on two Articles, the first related to the Tribute of the thousand Marks, which King John promised to pay every Year to the Holy See. He maintained that King John could not render his Kingdom Tributary, and his Engagement being never confirmed by the Barons, was to be deemed null and void. The other Article concerned the Clause of Non-obstante, inserted by the Pope in all his Bulls, a Clause entirely destructive of the Rights of Bishops, Abbots, Monasteries, and Patrons of Benefices. For instance, when the Pope had a mind to dispose of a Benefice, he inserted this Clause in his Bull, Non-obstante (i. e.) notwithstanding the Right of Patronage or other Privilege to the contrary (6). This was in effect to annihilate all the Rights and Liberties of the Church of England. To these two Grievances, the Ambassador added many more, concerning the perpetual Extortions of the Nuncio's and Legate's, and in general all the Oppressions to which the English Nation had long been exposed.

In vain did the Ambassadors expect an Answer from the Council. The Pope continually hindered the Affair from being considered. At length, perceiving they were only amused with continual Delays, they presented to the Council a Protestation against the Tribute granted by King John, and withdrew. During their stay at Lyons, the Pope never made the least Step to satisfy them. But when they were gone, he endeavoured to cast a Mist before the Eyes of the Council, by making them believe he intended to redress the Grievances complained of. To that end, two Bulls were drawn up, the first whereof permitted the English Patrons to present whom they pleased to the Livings in their Gift. By the second it was granted, that when a beneficed Italian died or resigned his Prieferment, another should not immediately succeed (7). He made a great Flourish on these two Bulls, as if he had granted some very signal Favours to England. But he staid till the Ambassadors were departed, for fear they should demonstrate how disproportionate this slight Satisfaction was to their Grievances. As to the Tribute, against which they protested, Innocent never intended the English Nation any Satisfaction. On the contrary, when the Council broke up, the Pope wrote thundering Letters to the English Prelates, expressly enjoining them to confirm and set their Seal to the Charter of Tribute granted by King John to the Holy See. Though the Bishops had very strong Reasons to excuse themselves from taking such a Step, they durst not however disobey, for fear of the threatened Excommunication. The King appeared at first displeased at the Pope's haughty Proceedings, and seemed willing to oppose his Pretensions. But he soon resumed his wonted Complaisance for whatever issued from the Court of Rome.

The War with Wales was the Reason this Affair lay dormant some time. The King who had long suffered the Welsh to infect his Borders with Impunity, at last headed his Army, threatening utterly to destroy their Country (8). But this sudden Blaze was quickly extinguished. He was no sooner entered Wales, but missing the Enemy, who were retired to their Mountains, he grew weary of the War, and after building the Castle [of Garn] on an advantageous Situation, returned to London (9).

Walter Earl of Pembroke dying this Year (10) without Issue Male, Ascelm his Brother, then Dean of Salisbury, was only of the his Heir, and succeeded him in his Office of Earl-Marshal. But he did not long enjoy it, being seized by Death a few Months after. Thus the noble Family of Pembroke and Strigoul was extinct, whereas the five last Earls, who were Brothers, were invested with the Dignity of Earl-Marshal, Hereditary in their Family (11).

David Prince of Wales died in the beginning of the Year 1246. As he had left no Children, the Lords of that Country chose for his Successor Leueilyn his Nephew, Son of the unfortunate Griffin, killed in endeavouring to escape out of the Tower of London.

The Quarrel with the Court of Rome was somewhat suppressed, when the Pope renewed it, by an Imposition upon the Ecclesiasticks, greater and more insupportable than all the former. The Clergy were so aw'd by the Roman Pontiffs, that they durst not stir towards freeing themselves from their Yoke. But it was otherwise with the Lay-Barons, who began to consult together and take measures to oppose these Oppressions. In a Parliament assembled during Leut (12), it was resolved that the Nation's Grievances should be committed to writing, and Satisfaction demanded of the Pope in a Letter (13), signed by the King, Bishops and Temporal Lords. The principal Grievances were these:

I. That the Pope, not content with the annual Payment of Peter-Pence, exacted from the Clergy great Contributions, without the King's Consent, against the Customs, Liberties, and Rights of the Church and Realm of England.

II. That the Patrons of Churches could not present fit Persons to the vacant Livings, the Pope conferring them generally on Italians, who understood not the English Language, and carried out of the Kingdom the Money arising from the Income of their Benefices.

III. That the Pope oppressed the Churches by exacting Pensions from them.

IV. That when an Italian Ecclesiastick died, his Benefice was immediately bestowed on one of the same Nation, as if the Italian had a Right to possess such a Number of Benefices in the Kingdom. That whereas the Italians were invested without Trouble or Charge, the English were forced to go and prosecute their Right at Rome, contrary to the Indulgences granted to England by former Popes.

1240. V. That in Churches filled by the Italians there were neither Alms, nor Hospitality; neither was there any Preaching, and the Care of Souls was entirely neglected.

VI. That the Clause of Non-obstante, generally inserted in all Bulls, absolutely destroyed all Laws, Customs, Statutes, and Privileges of the Church and Kingdom.

These Articles show that the Bulls granted by Innocent at the Council of Lyons, were not executed, since the same Grievances, which they seemed to redress, were still forced to be complained of.

The Pope continues his Oppressions. M. Paris. p. 681.

The Letter of the King and Barons had a contrary Effect to what was expected. The Pope accused the Clergy of extorting it by their Importunities, took occasion from thence to load them with new and unheard of Taxes. He not only compelled the Bishops to sign the Emperor's Excommunication (1), but moreover commanded each to find him a certain Number of Men well armed and armed, to serve against that Prince, pretending all Churches were equally concerned in the War (2). After this, to let the English see how little he valued their Murmurs, instead of reforming the old, he introduced a new Grievance, by claiming the Administration of the Goods of Ecclesiasticks dying Intestate. At first the King opposed the Execution of all these Articles; but the Fear of a threatened Interdict and Excommunication, obliged him as formerly, to submit to the Pope's Pleasure. This Compliance made the Pope so imperious (3), that he imposed a fresh Tallage of a third part of their Moveables upon Clergymen that resided on their Livings, and of one half upon Non-residents. This being the case, it is no wonder, if the Pope were so unwilling to make Peace with the Emperor, since the War furnished them with a Pretence to levy such frequent Taxes upon the Clergy. The Bishop of London was commissioned to execute this new Order, with Power to excommunicate and suspend the disobedient. But whilst this Prelate and some others were met upon this Occasion, the King sent them word not to consent to this Imposition, whereupon they broke up their Meeting. If Henry had as vigorously opposed all the other Attempts of the Court of Rome, he would have equally succeeded, since the Pope thought not fit to push this Matter any further, when he found a resolute Opposition (4).

Attempt of the Bishop of Lincoln. M. Paris. p. 716.

The absolute Power claimed by the Pope over Christians, caused pernicious Effects among some English Bishops, who imagined the Church's Authority to be unlimited. Upon this Ground, they pretended to extend it over civil Affairs, because there is hardly any thing but where Religion may be made to interpose. The Bishop of Lincoln, prepossessed with this Notion, took upon him this Year to make severe Inquisitions concerning the Life and Manners of ever particular Person in his Diocese. It may be, this was done with a good Intent, but the Danger was, that this Incroachment would be imitated by others, and at length degenerate into a real Tyranny. Accordingly, it was deemed a manifest Usurpation, to which the King put a stop by his own Authority (5).

Death of the King's Mother. Id.

Isabella, Countess of Marche, and Queen-Dowager of England, the King's Mother, died this Year (6), after living in no great Reputation, if we may believe certain Historians (7).

1247. The Pope's Excommunications. M. Paris. p. 722, 723. M. Welf.

The Year 1247, like the last, was spent almost wholly in Contests between the Pope and the Clergy; the first increasing his Oppressions, in proportion as the others vainly strove to secure themselves from them (8). In the beginning of this Year, the Bishops and Abbots were forced to make a Pardon of a thousand Marks (9) to a new Legate, sent by the Pope into England, upon no other account but to exact Money from the Clergy. At the same time, and for the same reason, there was a Nuncio in Ireland, who procured five hundred Marks (10). As the King was ever ready to countenance the Court of Rome's exactions, the Pope was willing in his Turn, to show him some mark of his Gratitude. To that end, he sent him a Bull, ordaining, that for the future, no Italian, not even the Nephew of a Cardinal, or the Pope himself, should be admitted to any Benefice in England without the King's Consent: Ample Recompence for the vast Sums drawn every Year by the Pope out of the Kingdom! A Privilege besides which signified nothing, for the Pope was very sure of obtaining the King's Consent, whenever he should vouchsafe to ask it (11).

The King's three half-Brothers, namely, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Abelmar, Sons of the Earl of Marche (12), arrived in England. The Earl their Father sent them to the King, to be eased of their maintenance, and in Expectation he would provide for them. So that when they arrived, they were destitute of all things, and had nothing to subsist upon but the Favours of the King their Brother. Henry was forced therefore not only to maintain them, but likewise to satisfy their Avarice and Ambition, with Presents, Places, and Benefices, to the Detriment of the English.

This same Year William Earl of Holland, a young Earl of Prince of twenty Years of Age, was elected King of the Romans, by the Intrigues of the Pope, who had deposed Frederic in the Council of Lyons. But his Holiness did not find it so easy to put him in possession of the Empire, as to procure him the Votes of part of the Electors.

1248. What fair Promises forever the King made the Parliament, upon their granting him the last Aid, he had however performed nothing. And therefore, when he demanded a fresh Supply of the Parliament assembled in the beginning of the Year 1248 (13), he received a very mortifying Answer. He was asked, how he could without blushing renew his Demands, after so frequent Breach of his Word. He was upbraided for his immoderate Kindness, and excessive Liberalities to the Foreigners; for his Contempt of his native Subjects; his Negligence in encouraging Trade, and protecting Merchants, of whom he even exacted Impositions which were not due. Very lively Complaints were made of his keeping in his own Hands the vacant Benefices, and conferring the prime Offices of the State, such as those of Chancellor, Treasurer, Justiciary, on Persons not qualified, without ever vouchsafing to consult his Parliament. Henry, perceiving by the Boldness of these Reproaches, that it would be very difficult to bring the Barons to any Temper, prorogued the Parliament (14), in order to gain time to consider what he should do.

During the Prorogation, the pernicious Advice of his Ministers hit him more and more against his Subjects, and induced him to be entirely governed by the Foreigners. Of this there quickly appeared a clear Evidence in the extraordinary Courage they inspired him with, of which he was naturally incapable. When the Parliament met, he upbraided the Barons, for endeavouring to impose upon him Laws, to which they themselves would think it hard to be liable: That every one of them was Master in his own Family; made use of what Counsellors he pleased; put in, and turned out his Domestic without Controul; but that he alone was treated like 1248. a Slave by his own Subjects (1). In short, he declared; that, far from changing his Ministry at their Pleasure, he meant to be Master in his own Kingdom; and that it was their duty to obey. As for the other Grievances complained of, he was contented, with returning general Answers, without specifying any thing. After that, he told them he expected a speedy Aid of Money, to enable him to recover the French Provinces. This unseasonable Haughtiness served only still more to exasperate the Barons. They boldly replied, Since he designed not to reform what was amiss, they were not so senseless as to continue to impoverish themselves for the sake of Foreigners, under pretence of an imaginary War. This Answer leaving the King no hopes, he chose to dissolve the Parliament, for fear they should proceed to more vigorous Resolutions. Mean time, as his Treasury was quite exhausted, he was forced to sell his Plate and Jewels, which were soon bought up by the Citizens of London. He was extremely incensed, to see the Londoners so readily find Money to purchase his Jewels, and yet continually plead Poverty, when he wanted a Supply. This Consideration put him far out of Humour, that he established a new Fair at Westminster, during which, all Commerce was prohibited in London (2). So far was he from hearkening to the Complaints of the Merchants on this occasion, that he gave them fresh Marks of his Displeasure, in keeping his Christmases in the City, and compelling them to present him with large New-Year Gifts. Shortly after, he demanded also a Supply of Money, and in spite of their Endeavours to the contrary, they were constrained to give him two thousand Pounds Sterling (3).

But to trifling a Sum not sufficing for his Wants, he bethought himself to borrow Money of the Barons, Bishops, Abbots, Merchants, and the richer sort of Citizens in the Kingdom. But as he found he was unable to force People to what he desired, he applied to them in so mean and cringing a manner, that one would have thought he was begging an Alms (4). Notwithstanding this debasing of himself, he was refused by the greatest part, who pleaded Poverty, though he pretended to be under an indispensable Necessity of making War upon France. But he could not possibly have invented a worse Pretence. Every one knew, he was strictly forbidden by the Pope to disturb the Territories of the French King, during his Absence, he being gone this Year to the Holy Land. The true reason that engaged him thus in search of Money, was, his being deeply in Debt, without having wherewithal to pay. Besides, his Brothers, to whom he could not refuse any thing, never regarded his Wants; but continually pressed him with their unreasonable Demands: His fondness for them was such, that he missed no Opportunity of heaping Favours on them, though he could not be ignorant that every Favour gave fresh cause of discontent to the English Barons.

Shortly after, the Bishoprick of Durham becoming void (5), Henry earnestly recommended Abelmar the youngest of his Brothers, tho' he was far from being of a sufficient Age and Capacity to govern so large a Diocese. Accordingly that objection was made to him by the Monks of Durham. They moreover represented to him, that he had often promised to leave to the Churches the freedom of Elections, and therefore humbly intreated him to let them enjoy the Effect of his promises. Henry, offended at these Remonstrances, returned in Answer, That since they thought his Brother too young; he would keep the Bishoprick in his own Hands till he should be of a fit Age.

Alexander II. King of Scotland, died this Year; leaving Alexander III. his Son, of eight Years of Age; to succeed him.

About this time, the King being informed, that certain Gascon Lords were revolted, sent into Guienne, Simon de Montfort Earl of Leicester, who reduced the Rebels to Obedience, and gained a great Reputation (6).

In the beginning of the next Year, Prince Richard, the King's Brother, set out with a magnificent Retinue (7), to confer with the Pope, who was still at Lyons. This Journey, and the extraordinary Honours paid him by the Pope, afforded Matter for divers Speculations, which exercised the Wits of the Politicians. But the real Motive thereof was unknown till some Years after.

How pressing soever the King's Necessities were, he took the Cross from the Hands of the Legate, and vowed to go and war against the Saracens of Palestine. His Example was followed by above five hundred Knights (8), and an incredible Number of Esquires and People of an inferior Condition. After all the Denials Henry had met with from the Parliament, he must have foreseen how difficult it would be, to obtain an Aid suitable to an Undertaking of this Nature. And therefore his Design was not to go the Voyage, but to draw from the Parliament a large Subsidy upon that pretence, in a belief they durst not deny him. At least, he was persuaded, the Methods he should use to exact Money from his Subjects, would be authorized by so plausible a Reason. Besides, he was very sensible, that with part of the Money, he could easily procure a Dispensation of his Vow. His Conduct afterwards confirms this Conjecture.

Be this as it will, those that had taken the Cross with the King, prepared themselves with all speed; and perceiving he made no Preparations, offered to go without him. Their Haste was very displeasing to him, as it too plainly discovered his Backwardness in a Cause, where all the World strove to shew Marks of their Zeal. To remedy this Inconvenience, he desired the Pope to hinder his Subjects from going, before he was ready to head them. This Favour was readily granted, and the Interests of the King of France, who might have made good use of this Reinforcement, were sacrificed on this occasion to the Pope's Desire of contenting the King of England. Innocent forbid the English, under pain of Excommunication, to set out before the King, and by that means, all the Charges they had been at for their Voyage became useless. If this Prohibition caused many Murmurs in England, it was not more favourably considered in France. Every one openly said, it was a plain case, the Pope did not much trouble himself, whether Lewis succeeded in his Expedition, since he deprived him of the Assistance of the English Croisiers.

Mean time, Henry not daring to demand Money of the Parliament, used all sorts of Methods to raise it elsewhere. One of his most effectual ways was, to commission a Judge entirely devoted to him, to go and make Inquisition in all the Counties, concerning Trespasses upon the Royal Forests. This Commission was in it self very odious, since it included all the Cases excepted in King John's Charter. But the manner, in which it was executed by the Inquisitor, rendered it still more intolerable: for he punished the least Fault by excessive Fines, or Confiscation of Estate. By these arbitrary Proceedings he procured the King a large Sum of Money, but withal drew on him the Hatred and Curses of the People (9).

Amidst these Transactions, Henry was not unmindful of his Relations: The Bishoprick of Winchester, the richest in the Kingdom, being vacant, the King strongly recommended his Brother Abelmar, whom the Chapter of Durham had refused the last Year. He was not satisfied with sending recommendatory Letters, but would go in Person to Winchester, to support his Interest by his Presence. On the Day of Election he came into the Chapter-House, and made a short Sermon upon this Text, Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other, which he applied in the best manner he could to the

(1) This reasoning is very fallacious, though it has all along been used by those, who do not consider that a Person's Mismanagement of his own private Affairs affects none but himself; whereas the Misadministration of a public Minister is detrimental to the whole Kingdom, and consequently it highly concerns a Nation, that the great Offices of the State be filled with good and able Men.

Though he met at first with great Opposition, by reason of the Youth and Insufficiency of the Person recommended, yet by his Promises and Threats he at last obtained his Desire. The Affairs of Sicily.

As I am soon to enter upon an Affair which wholly employed Henry several Years, I think myself obliged to shew, by way of Digression, the Rise and Progress thereof. I mean, the Pope's Donation of the Kingdom of Sicily to Prince Edmund, Son of our Henry. But to give such an Idea of this Matter, as may serve for the better understanding the Sequel, it will be necessary, not only to see what passed in Italy at the time of this Donation, but also to take the Thing from its first Original. This Digression will not seem impertinent, when this unhappy Affair will be seen hereafter to be a fertile Source of Oppressions upon the English, as well from their King as the Roman Pontiffs. Besides, it serves to discover three Things equally remarkable in the History of this Reign. First, the Character of Henry, and his Indiscretion to engage in the most difficult Undertakings, without foreseeing the Obstacles. Secondly, The Authority assumed by the Popes in England, and their manifest abuse of it. Lastly, We shall see, this same Affair was the chief occasion of the Troubles in the end of this Reign. Though the Events I am going to relate, formerly made a great noise, and deserved the greater Attention, yet as they belong not properly to the History of England, I shall abridge them as much as possible, and say no more than is absolutely necessary for the Sequel of this Reign.

Every one that is the least versed in the History of Europe, knows, that towards the Close of the Eleventh Century, some Norman Nobles, Sons of Tancred de Hauteville, conquered the Island of Sicily upon the Saracens, and Apulia, Calabria, and several other Southern Provinces of Italy, upon the Emperors of Constantinople. These first Conquerors, from a religious Principle, or some other Motive, did Homage to the Pope for their Conquests; and made themselves Vassals and Feudataries to the Church of Rome, though she gave them nothing, nor had even promoted their Undertakings. Whatever their Policy might be, in thus submitting voluntarily to the Holy See, it is a Fact beyond all Dispute. The Conquests of the Normans were at first divided into several Parts, whereof Sicily beyond the Faro, or the Island of Sicily, made a Kingdom of it self. The rest was divided into Dukedoms or Principalities, under the Name of Sicily on this Side the Faro, of which Calabria and Apulia were the Chief. This is what was afterwards called the Kingdom of Naples. All these several Parts, I mean the two Sicilies, were at length reduced into one Kingdom, under Roger I, Tancred's youngest Son, who assumed the Title of King of Sicily. He had for Successor William I, his Son, surnam'd the Bad, to whom succeeded William II, his Son, called the Good, to distinguish him from his Father. William the Good dying without Issue, the Sicilians thought fit to place on the Throne Tancred, base Son of Roger I, who added to the Title of his Predecessor, that of King of Naples, or Sicily on this Side the Faro. It is necessary to observe, that by Sicily is meant sometimes the Island of Sicily alone, sometimes both the Sicilies together as making but one Kingdom.

Clement III, who sat in the Papal Chair in the time of Tancred, considered the Proceedings of the Sicilians as an Inroad upon his Rights. He pretended that by the Death of William the Good, without Heirs, the two Sicilies were devolved to the Holy See, and as Lord Paramount, he could dispose of them as he pleased. Mean time, as spiritual Weapons were incapable of dethroning a Prince in possession, Clement sent into Apulia, and Calabria, an Army, which at first made some progress. But Death seizing him presently after, prevented him from pushing his Enterprize any further. Celestine III, his Successor, resolved to prosecute what his Predecessor had begun. But perceiving he could not compass his ends with his own Forces alone, he deemed it necessary to engage in this quarrel, some Prince who was able to support him. For that purpose, he invested the Emperor Henry VI with the two Sicilies, on condition of the Homage, to which the first Norman Kings had obliged themselves to the Roman Church. However, it was to be feared, so arbitrary an Act, especially in favor of a Foreigner, would exasperate the Sicilians, and attach them more firmly to Tancred. To prevent this Inconvenience, and give withal some colour of Justice to what he had done, he caused Constantia, Daughter of Roger I, to be taken out of the Monastery of St. Severus's at Palermo, of which she was Abbess (2). This Princess, who was then fifty years old, being brought to Rome, the Pope absolved her from all her Vows, and gave her in Marriage to Henry, thereby to add a more plausible Right to the Grant he had made that Monarch. Besides, by means of this Marriage, he hoped to sow among the Sicilians, Seeds of Dissension, of which himself and the Emperor might make an Advantage. Henry supported by this additional Right, immediately headed his Army and marched into Apulia, where however he made no great progress, by reason of the Pestilence that raged among his Troops, and of some other Affairs which obliged him to return to Germany. So that Tancred kept the Crown of Sicily till his death in 1145. William III, his Son succeeded him.

Henry no sooner heard of Tancred's death, but he marched back into Italy, and besieged the City of Naples, which made a vigorous Defence. The Resistance of the Neapolitans causing the Emperor to despair of accomplishing his Undertaking by Force, he resolved to use Artifice. To that end, he proposed to the King of Sicily to decide their quarrel by a Treaty. William's Apprehension of losing all his Dominions; made him readily consent to be dispossessed of a part, in order to purchase Peace, of a Competitor much more powerful than himself. By the Treaty it was agreed, the Emperor should have the Island of Sicily, and William, the Kingdom of Naples. Pursuant to this Agreement, Henry came to Palermo and was crowned. But whilst William was preparing to retire to his Kingdom, Henry seized his Person, and ordered him to be conducted to Germany, where this unfortunate Prince was deprived of his Sight, and castrated. Henry being thus without a Rival, took possession of the Kingdom of Naples, in spite of the Endeavours of certain Lords of Norman Race to the contrary.

The Emperor's Affairs being thus prosperous, he sent for his Empress, who was big with Child though fifty two Years old. Her time of Delivery being come whilst he was on the Road, she staid at Gissi a little Town on the Frontiers of Ancona, where he ordered all the Women of the Town, that had the Curiosity, to be Eye-Witnesses of her Delivery. To that purpose, he caused a Pavilion to be erected in the middle of the Market-Place, where she was delivered of a Prince called Frederic. From that time, Henry kept possession of the two Sicilies till his Death, which happened not before the Year 1199.

This Monarch left his Son Frederic aged eleven Years, under the Guardianship of his Mother Constantia, who immediately caused him to be acknowledged King of the two Sicilies, and to be crowned two Years after at Palermo. After that, he was invested by Innocent III, who was then Pope. Constantia his Mother dying three Years after, left the Guardianship of her Son to Innocent, who governed the two Sicilies by a Cardinal during Frederic's Minority. This young Prince being arrived at fourteen Years of Age, married Constantia Daughter of Alphonse IV. King of Castile, and two Years after was elected Emperor, by the opposite Party to Otto of Saxony, whom the Pope had excommunicated. He could not however prevail with Innocent to set the Imperial Crown on his Head, the Pope dreading it might be dangerous to the Holy See, to raise to the Empire a Prince of the House of Suabia, which had been so troublesome to his Predecessors. It was not till the Year 1220, and after the Death of Otho, that Frederic was crowned by Honorius III. Constantia his Wife died two Years after, leaving him a Son called Henry, who in 1223 was elected King of the Romans. Afterwards he married Yolande Daughter of John de Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem, who died in 1228, leaving him a Son named Conrade. In fine, in 1235, Frederic took for his third Wife, Isabella of England, who died in 1241, having brought him two Princes, Jordan and Henry, the first of which died a Child.

Having mentioned this Emperor's several Marriages, the Knowledge whereof is absolutely necessary, it is time to speak of his Contentions with the Popes. Ever since Richard King of England quitted Palestine, the Affairs of the Christians in those parts were in a very ill Situation. The Saracens taking Advantage of the Coldness of the Europeans, with regard to the Crusades, made great Progress, and the Christians never thought of forming any fresh Attempts against them. Honorius III., who sat in the Papal Chair, in the beginning of the Reign of Frederic II., desiring to retrieve the Christians Losses in the Holy Land, published in the Year 1234, a Crusade, in which infinite Numbers of People of all Conditions engaged. An Historian assures us that above threefold thousand English took the Cross for this Expedition, of which Frederic was to be Head, both as Emperor, and as Son-in-law to John de Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem.

Whilst all Europe was preparing for this Undertaking, some Disputes unexpectedly arising between the Emperor and certain Cities of Italy, retarded that Prince's Preparations, who was willing to see an End of these Contentions before his Departure. Gregory IX., Successor to Honorius, finding Frederic proceeded but slowly, in comparison of the other Crosses, wrote him a Letter exhorting him to persevere in his pious Resolution. He represented to him that the Success of the Crusade depended on him, since the Management was committed to him. Mean time, the Crosses of the several States of Europe, repaired in Multitudes to the Holy Land, expecting to be soon followed by their General. But Frederic chose rather to employ his Forces against the revolted Cities of Italy, than against the Saracens. Nevertheless, as he was earnestly pressed by the Pope, he pretended to prepare indeed, and even went and embarked at Brindisi. But after being three Days at Sea, he failed back to Land, on pretence of a sudden Illness, which he feigned to be seized with, as most Historians affirm. This News reaching Palestine, above forty thousand of the Crosses who were gone before, returned in the same Ships that brought them thither. The Pope enraged to see so fair an Opportunity lost by the Emperor's Fault, as he pretended, publicly excommunicated him, and sent the Bull of Excommunication to all the Princes of Christendom to be published in their Dominions. All the World however does not think the Pope's Severity to Frederic, proceeded from the sole Motive of Religion. Some affirm it was only a Pretence to break the Emperor's Measures in Italy, in favour of the revolted Cities, which were privately countenanced by the Court of Rome. Be this as it will, it gave Birth to a Quarrel which occasioned innumerable Calamities to Europe, and particularly to Italy. Frederic, incensed at the Pope's Proceedings, took care to justify his Conduct to all the Potentates of Europe, by Letters wherein the Pope was severely handled. But he was not satisfied with so slight a Revenge. By means of a powerful Party in Rome, he expelled Gregory thence, and forced him to take Refuge at Perugia. However, to shew his Illness was the sole Cause of his Delay, and consequently the Excommunication denounced upon him was unjust and rash, he set out the next Year for Palestine. The Progress of his Arms in that Country was so great and rapid, that in a short time he compelled the Sultan of Egypt to deliver up Jerusalem. He would have pushed his Conquests farther, if the Knights Hospitallers, who were gained by the Pope, had not laid Obstacles in his way by their daily Plots against him. On the other hand, Gregory, offended that the Emperor regardless of his Censures should dare to undertake this Expedition, before he was reconciled to the Church, and without making, as he charged him, Preparations suitable to so great an Undertaking, renewed his Excommunication, for two contrary Faults. First, for too long deferring his Departure. Secondly, for departing too soon. But the Pope, not content with attacking him with Spiritual, employed likewise Temporal Arms. He sent John de Brienne, Father-in-law to Frederic, at the Head of an Army, into the Kingdom of Naples, with the title of Vicar of the Holy See, to wrest from his Son-in-law that part of his Dominions.

The Quarrel between the Emperor and the Pope still increasing, all the Cities of Italy sided with one or other. Then were formed the two Factions of the Guelphs and Gibelines, which so long harassed that Country, the former for the Pope, the latter for the Emperor. It will be needless to relate here the bloody Wars that ensued. Wars, which frequently gave occasion to think, that Zeal for Religion was not the principal Motive of the Roman Pontiffs. It suffices to say in two Words, that Gregory's Successors eagerly pursued his Project of wresting from Frederic not only the Sicilies, but all Italy, and the Empire itself. In fine, Innocent IV. having publicly deposed him in the Council of Lyons, caused William Earl of Holland to be elected Emperor in his place. But, notwithstanding this pretended Deposition, Frederic kept possession of the Throne till his Death, about the end of the Year 1250.

To give a distinct Notion of the Affairs of Sicily, wherein England will presently be concerned, it may not be amiss to add here Part of the Genealogy of the Family of Frederic II. extracted from the History of Naples, by Giovanne Summonte.

FREDERIC II. Emperor.

The same Day Frederic died, he made a Will, and left Austria to Frederic his Grandson, of which the young Prince was already in possession, in Right of his Mother. To Conrade his second Son, he gave the Kingdom of Naples or Sicily on this Side the Faro, upon this Condition, that if Conrade died without Issue, his Brother Henry, Son of Isabella of England, should succeed him, and in case he died also without Heirs, Manfred his Bastard Son should inherit. This same Henry, Son of his third Wife, was to be King of the Island of Sicily, and Manfred his natural Son was to have the Principality of Tarentum, with the Regency of the two Kingdoms, namely, of the first, in the Absence of Conrade; and of the second, during Henry's Minority.

As soon as Frederic was in his Grave, Manfred would have taken possession of the Kingdom of Naples, in the Name of Conrad. But the Pope's Party were so powerful, when they had nothing more to fear from the Emperor, that the principal Cities, as Naples and Capua, shut their Gates against him. This Resistance forced him to call his Brother Conrad into Italy, who upon Frederic's Death assumed the Title of Emperor, though William Earl of Holland was acknowledged by the Pope and his Party. Upon the Arrival of Conrad, Things had another Face, and he made the Neapolitans often repent of espousing the Pope's Quarrel. Mean time, Innocent used all possible means to stop his Progress. He thundered his Censures against Conrad, as he had done against Frederic his Father, and by siding the Guelphs his Adherents, he kept up the War in Italy, in expectation of a more favorable Juncture. Here I shall end this long Digression, which I hope will not be deemed needless, when we come to see how far England was concerned in this Quarrel. But to return to our History.

The Year 1251 was ushered in with the first Instance of the Clause of Non-obstante in the Orders of the King, in Imitation of the Pope, who used it long since in his Bulls. The Bishop of Carlisle having a Law-Suit (1) with a certain Baron of his Diocese, and being obliged to go to France, obtained an Order from the King, that the Suit should be stopt till his Return. But, during his Absence, his Adversary found means to obtain a second Order with this Clause, Non-obstante, or Notwithstanding the former Order, the Baron's Cause should not be delayed (2).

Besides the Principles of arbitrary Power instilled by Hubert de Burgh and the Bishop of Winchester into Henry in his Youth, and which he usually made the rule of his Conduct, he had moreover another reason to induce him to have but little regard for his Subjects. This was the Consideration of the Advantages gained by the Earl of Leicester over the Rebels of Guienne. Ever since the Earl was Governor of that Province, he had served his Master so faithfully, that in all appearance, he would have nothing to fear for some time, from the Inconstancy of the Gascons. As Henry was soon daunted, so a very small matter sufficed to raise his Courage. The Chastisement of the Gascons making him imagine, their Example would keep the English in Awe, he fancied for the future he might use them as he pleased. Accordingly, without regarding the continual murmurs of the Barons, on account of the Preference given to Foreigners, he affected to receive, with excessive Civilities, Guy de Lusignan his half Brother, when the Earl of Leicester brought with him, when he came to acquaint him with what was done in Guienne. He made him such considerable Presents, that they would have appeared extravagant, even though he had abounded in Riches. These Things caused the Barons to redouble their Complaints. They could not bear that the King should give so many Marks of his Affection to Foreigners, whilst he slighted his own native Subjects.

Henry's Wants, and his little Prospect of drawing a Supply from the Parliament, made him forget his Expedition to the Holy-Land. But, on a sudden, he was admonished by a Letter from the Pope, that it was time to perform his Vow. He was then at York, celebrating the Nuptials of the Princess Margaret his Daughter with the young King of Scotland (3). This Wedding was not the sole Motive of his being at York. As the Prince his Son-in-law was very young, he hoped to persuade him to do Homage for the whole Kingdom of Scotland. He was very urgent with him, but the young Prince executed himself very handsomely. He represented to him that he was come to York to be married, and not to debate an Affair of that Nature, liable to many difficulties, and upon which he could determine nothing, without consulting the States of his Kingdom. However, he did the customary Homage for the Lands held of the Crown of England (4). Whether Henry thought his Pretensions were not well-grounded, or was unwilling to disturb the Nuptial-Fest, by insisting on his Demand, the Affair went no farther. We shall see in the next Reign, that these same Pretensions were the Ground of a bloody War between England and Scotland (5).

This Interview ending to the Satisfaction of the two Kings, Henry seemed willing to prepare in good earnest for his Voyage to the Holy-Land. As Money was the most necessary Preparation, he took occasion from this Voyage to extort great Sums from the Jews, nor were his Christian Subjects less spared. But what could be obtained by these means was not sufficient to enable him to make an Expedition to the East worthy a Successor of Richard, whose Memory was still fresh among the Saracens.

Whilst the King was employed in preparing for his pretended Voyage, there came Deputies from the Gascons, complaining of being unjustly oppressed by the Earl of Leicester. The Earl hearing of these Complaints, went to the King to justify himself, and denied whatever was laid to his Charge: Adding, he could not but wonder, that the King should give Ear to the frivolous Complaints of the rebellious Gascons, against one that had served him so faithfully, and spent all his Estate in a Post where others were wont to enrich themselves. Henry replied, he gave no Credit to these Accusations; on the contrary, to make his Innocence the more conspicuous, he was resolved to send Commissioners into Guienne (6), to take Information concerning the Behaviour of the Gascons. Mean time, to convince him, that these Accusations had made no ill Impressions on him, he furnished him with Money, and ordered him to be prepared to return to Guienne.

Before the Earl was ready to depart, the Gascons being informed of the King's Design to send him back, deputed the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, to renew their Complaints. Whilst the Archbishop was at London, the Commissioners, that were sent to Guienne, returned (7). They reported, that indeed the Earl of Leicester had treated a little severely some Lords of that Country; but however, he had only used them according to their Deserts. Though the Earl of Leicester was fully cleared by these Reports, yet the King was persuaded by the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, that if the Earl returned to Guienne, nay, if he was not punished, that Province would be irrecoverably lost to the Crown of England. This Notion was so deeply imprinted on the King's Mind, that, to secure the Allegiance of the Gascons, he resolved to sacrifice their Governor to their Repentment. To that purpose, he ordered their Accusation to be brought before the Peers, not questioning but he should have Interest enough to get him condemned. Mean time, Leicester, though surprized at the King's sudden Change, was not idle. He found means to gain Prince Richard, the Earl of Gloucester, and several other Lords of great Credit, who promised to support him. Upon this Assurance he appeared in Court, and vindicated himself with such Strength and Evidence, that the Archbishop of Bourdeaux was at a loss how to maintain his Accusation. Besides, whenever he offered to speak, in defence of what he advanced, he saw the principal Lords always ready to improve their Friend's Arguments. The King, perceiving the Affair was like to end contrary to his Expectation, could not help shewing his Uneasiness, and even dropping some Expressions very injurious to the Party accused. As the Earl of Leicester, not content with justifying his Actions, boasted moreover of his Services, and boldly called upon the King to perform his Royal Word, by rewarding him according to his Promise, Henry sharply replied, He did not think himself obliged to keep his Word with a Traytor. This Answer had such an Effect on the Earl, who was in a Passion before, that not considering he was speaking to his Sovereign, he told him, He lied: and were he not a King, he would make him eat his Words. Then after some insolent Expressions, added, That it was hard to believe such a Prince was a Christian, or had ever been at Confession. Prince, answered the King, I am a Christian, and have often been at Confession. What signifies Confession, replied the Earl, without Repentance? I never repented any thing so much, said the King, as the bestowing my Favours on one that has so little Gratitude, and much ill-manners. After this he would have apprehended him, but finding the Earl's Friends were ready to oppose it, he was seized with Fear, and durst not execute his Design. Nay, he suffered them to speak in the Earl's behalf, and without being revenged for the Affront he had received, he was contented with a slight Satisfaction, and was outwardly reconciled to him. However, the Earl's Insolence made so deep an Imprestion upon his Mind, that he could never look upon him without Horror, which is the less to be wondered at, because this doubtless is the only Instance of a Subject's giving his sovereign the Lie to his Face. For which reason one should hardly believe so extraordinary a Fact, were it not unanimously attested by all the Historians.

not unaccountably fewer the King hated this Earl of Leicester, who, for his part, him G-vernour again to Guernsey (1), and to La Rochelle, but remove him from England, where his Credit was too great. Besides, he was apprehensive, the Earl would obstruct his Design of conferring Guernsey on Prince Edward his eldest Son, which was immediately done after his Departure. The Gazetters were overjoyed at this Change. As they had no longer the same reason to fear Leicester who was going to be recalled, they laid to many Shares for him, that he had like to have been surprized. For his part, he made them frequently feel the Effects of his Repentment before he left the Province.

The Affront lately received from the Earl of Leicester was not the only thing that disturbed the King. He was still more warmly touched with the Clergy's Denial (2) of a Subsidy. As he was convinced that a bare Demand would be to no purpose, he took care to have it supported by an express Order from the Court of Rome. Innocent alledging for pretence, that the King could not possibly proceed without an extraordinary Aid towards his Voyage to the Holy-Land, commanded all Ecclesiastics to pay him 1000 l. Tents of their Revenues for three Years (3). The Clergy being assembled upon this occasion, three or 4 Bishops (4) gained by the King, and particularly the Bishop of Winchester his half Brother, voted in his favour.

But the Bishops of Lincoln strenuously opposed it, and got the Majority to agree to petition the King, for his Soul's Health, to desist from his Demand. The Bishops Petition served only to exasperate the King. He sent them word to take care what they did, since they not only opposed their Temporal and Spiritual Sovereign, but also the Universal Church, and Jesus Christ himself. But without regarding these Menaces, the Clergy returned a very often Answer, by which they seemed to throw off all Respect for him. They upbraided him in very harsh Terms, for his Extortions, Tyranny, Breach of Promises and Oaths, and then broke up, without waiting his Answer, on pretence that both the Archbishops being absent, they could do nothing without the consent of their Primates (§). Henry, perceiving he could obtain nothing from this Assembly, tried to gain the principal Members by Caresses. To that end, he sent for the Bishop of Ex, and causing him to be brought into his Closet, received him very graciously, in order to extort some Promise from him. But this Prelate, who was no Courtier, far from having any Complaisance for the King, expelled himself very roughly. He plainly told him, it was a Folly to engage in an Expedition to the Holy-Land, and that he ought to take warning by the unfortunate Example of the King of France, who lay languishing in the Hands of the Infidels. Henry finding, contrary to his Expectations, the Bishop aimed the Air of a Counsellor, had not patience to hear him any longer, and commanded him to be gone out of his Presence (§).

As the perilling of the English in refusing Money, provoked the King, and made him place still greater Confidence in the Politicians, so the continual Favors he heaped on the Foreigners quite alienated the Barons from him. It was therefore almost inevitable but these mutual Differences should cause in the end very fatal Effects, as it afterwards happened. It is even a wonder that the Rupture between the King and the Barons did not sooner break out. Animosity was come to that height, that as he had no regard for his Subjects, they, on their Side said as

ministration. The Londoners were of all the Kingdom the most incensed, by reason of the heavy imposition on them. But they had soon found Cause to complain of a Tax of twenty Mark of Gold, imposed upon the Citizens by the King. This Imposition was inconsiderable, and concerned the City of London only. However, it was the Kingdom murmured at it, as a violation of Majesty's Power, in which they desired the Consistory to interpose.
But however, a few Days after, the King, with great Majesty, himself to please the Londoners, commanded them to appear up their shops, during Whitthorn Fair, with their Windows open Days. This Innovation, being deemed a manifest Breach of the Privileges of the City, and a Violation of the Rights among the Inhabitants, and a Refinement, and furns whereof became visible upon the first day of the Never did Prince to all time all his Life. Henry, Whom every one endeavoured to make the seemingly favorable Judgment, Henry had a particular Talent to form all his Projects at the most proper Season. He was not ignorant that the Nobles were dissatisfied, and in a sort of Combination to protect the Person of Leicester. He had just given the Clergy a fresh Cause of Dispute, by procuring a Bull to absolve him from his Oath, and entirely alienated the Hearts of the Peers by the Violation of their Privileges. At this Time, however it was that he undertook once more to have the Earl of Leicester tried by his Peers, whom he conceived for that purpose. Accordingly this Affair ended greatly to his Disatisfaction. Far from condemning the Earl, the Barons said openly, that the King had done him very great Injustice in giving Guienne to Prince Edward during the Term of his Government was expired, and without making him any amends (8). This Declaration, which probably was going to be followed by some ungrateful Resolution to the Kings, made him dissolve an Assembly which seemed so little inclinable to favour his Design (9).

Thus this weak Prince, by an unfeeling and capricious Conduct, increased the Enmity of his Subjects, which of all things he ought to have dreaded, had he been wise enough to take warning by his Father's unhappy Example. Continually bawling with indifference and greedy Frenzy, who minded only their own Interests, he saw nothing at as represented by his Ministers, who made him believe, that as long as he was supported by the Court of Rome, he need not fear the vain Efforts of his Subjects. These Counsels induced him perpetually to countenance the Exhortations of the Pope, and the Avariciousness of his Ministers and Ministers, to whom he was always making Presents with incredible Profusions. It was thus he increased the clear Revenues of the Crown. By his Ministers he was little contentful with his own Interests, but he himself always poor, whilst his Relations, his Cardinals, and the Pope's Creatures, were enriching, at the Expence of his Subjects. The Bishop of a great diocese to open his Eyes, called an exact Account to be taken of this Year of the annual Income enjoyed by the Pope in England. It was found to amount to near Seventy thousand Marks, when the Revenue of the Crown at the same time scarce exceeded a third part of the Sum. To this we may add another particular, to show the Enrichment of this Prince, and the Greediness of his Ministers. Mansfeld, one of his Favourites, a Clergyman, and a Jew, left thus seven hundred Ecclesiastical Prelates at once, who brought him in yearly five thousand Marks.

Whilst these things passed in England, the Emperor, Canard and Pope Innocent IV, carried their War in Sicily, but to the great disadvantage of the last, whose Spiritual Arms were of little force against a Prince that despised them. As the Pope found always too weak to compos his ends, he imagined that by offering the Crown of Sicily to some rich Prince, he should easily persuade him to supply whatever was necessary for the Conquest. Of all the Princes in Europe on whom he cast his Eyes, he saw none better qualified to embark in this Undertaking than Richard Earl of Cornwall, Brother to the King of England. Before that this Prince was Master of a large Estate; which he knew how to manage better than the King his Brother, it was very likely he would be dazzled with the Lustre of a Crown, That of England seeming to be too remote from him, as the King had two Sons. This Resolution being taken, Innocent dispatched one Albert as his Nuncio, to offer him the Crown of Sicily, on condition he would wrest it from the Sons of Frederic. Richard rejected not the Proposal; but insisted on certain previous Articles, which the Pope did not relish. I. That the Conquest of Sicily should be carried on at his and the Pope's joint Charges. II. That Innocent should deliver him up certain Place in the Kingdom of Naples, as well for his Security, as to serve for Magazines. III. That he should receive him Holiness for the Performance of his Word. These Terms agreed not at all with the Pope's Designs. He was in hopes Richard, deeming the bare Grant of Sicily as a singular Favour, would engage to supply what Money was necessary for the Conquest, and rely on the Word of him that made him so noble a Present. But when he saw the Prince was not willing to be his Dupe, and seemed to understand his own Interest too well, he dropped the Project, and recalled his Nuncio. This Negotiation not having the Effect he expected, he was obliged to continue the War at his own Expence, till he could engage in the Undertaking a more easy and less wary Prince.

Henry thought he had prevented the Revolt of the Gascons by removing the Earl of Leicester from the Government of Guienne. But it was not long before he perceived the Violence of that Earl, which they considered as an insupportable Obstacle to their pernicious Designs, to be the real Motive of their Complaints. Leicester had no sooner resigned his Patent (1), but a Plot was discovered in Guienne, to deliver that Province to the King of Castile. Though that Prince had never before made known his Designs to Guienne, when he saw his Party strengthened by the Earl of Leicester's Retreat, he began openly to declare himself. He pretended a Grant of that Country from Henry II, confirmed by Richard and John. It is true indeed, these Charters were never produced. But he had artfully provided some discontented Lords, that they were in his Hands. Upon this Foundation, he formed in Guienne a powerful Party, of which Gaston de Armagnac, Viscount of Bearn, was head. It is very likely, Henry's want of Courage inspired the King of Castile with the Thought of becoming Master of Guienne upon this frivolous Title. At last, he believed he had reason to hope, that, either by Arms, or by way of Treaty, he should procure some part of that Province. Be this as it will, these Pretensions, though apparently very weak, raised Commotions in Guienne, which made Henry often repent of removing the Earl of Leicester. In short, the Male-Contents, that Henry was forced to go in Person to save the Country. But there was occasion for Money, and it was necessary to allude the War in Guienne, to procure any sum to subside, who were too much dissatisfied with all his usual Expeditions to be prevailed upon by that Consideration. It seemed therefore more expedient to keep to his old pretence, namely, his Voyage to the Holy-Land, because Religion was therein concerned. As soon as the Parliament, called upon that account, was met (2), the King demanded a large Sum to enable him to accomplish his Vow. He represented, that having been obliged to make an impossibility of undertaking the Voyage, the Claims of Palestine must have been great Subject by these Delays.

Though the Barons were fully convinced, the King did not intend to go to the Holy Land, they were afraid however, of giving him time advantage, in case they refused the Supply demanded on so plausible a Pretence. They resolved therefore to grant an Aid, but clogged with Conditions, from whence they expected some Benefit, whereas the King executed his Project, or, as was suspected, applied the Money to other Uses. This Resolution being taken, they sent Deputies to him with their Answer, the Substance of which was, That in case he would leave to the Churches the Freedom of Elections, 1255. and sincerely observe the King his Father's Charters, they would do their utmost to content him. Henry, who expected this Message, was prepared with an Answer. He told them, he owned that on certain occasions he had carried the Prerogative Royal a little too far; but was firmly resolved never to be guilty of the like Fault again. Adding, they might be assured, the Charters of King John should be punctually kept. Then addressing himself to such of the Deputies as were of the Clergy (3), he had them consider, that among the Prelates who then governed the Church of England, there were few but who were promoted to their Dignities, by means of that Prerogative Royal they complained of. He asked them, whether they themselves, at the Time of their Elections, would have wished for that Freedom they now so earnestly demanded? He continued to say, since they desired him to correct what was amiss in the Government, they themselves ought to set him a good Example, and resign the Bishopricks and Abbies acquired by illegal Ways, and he promised them, their Places should be filled with none but Persons of Learning and Probity. The Prelates being confounded at this sharp Reproof, had nothing to Reply, but that the Bishops at present was not in a manner was past, but to prevent the like Endeavour for the future. As the King's sole Aim was to draw Money from the Parliament, he did not push Matters any farther. Content with having a little mortified the Clergy, he said, he was ready to join with the Parliament in all necessary Measures to redress the Grievances. Upon these Assurances the Clergy granted him the Tenth of their Revenues for three years, and the Barons, three Marks of every Knight's Fee held immediately of the Crown.

The King's Promise to observe the Charters, was too expressly not to be executed. Accordingly, without any Solicitation, he convened (4), in the great Hall of the Palace of Westminster, an Assembly, at which were present all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, with lighted Tapers in their Hands. The King would not hold one, saying, he would lay his Hand upon his Heart, during the whole Ceremony, to show he sincerely consented to what was going to be pronounced. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury standing up before all the People, denounced a terrible Curse against all, that for the future, should oppose directly or indirectly the Observance of the two Charters, and likewise against those that should any way violate, diminish, or alter the Laws and Constitutions of the Kingdom. This Anathema being denounced, the two Charters were read aloud, and confirmed by the King, who kept his Hand all the while on his Breast (5). This done, every one threw down his Taper upon the Ground, and wished that those who violated the Charters might thus smother in Hell.

Who would not have thought that the King's Assent to a Curse so solemnly denounced, was an unqualified Proof of his Intent religiously to keep his Promise? Perhaps he really intended it when he laid his Hand upon his Heart. However, the Parliament was no longer dissuaded but he fell to contriving all possible means to break through it. Besides that he was naturally inconstant, and not over scrupulous, it is said, he was persuaded to this Resolution, by some of his Favorites, who told him he would be but the Shadow of a King, as long as these Charters were in Force. But as they perceived he was restrained by the Consideration of his Oath, they advised him to apply to the Pope, intimating that for two or three hundred Marks it would be easy to get it annulled. This weak Prince, who generally followed the most pernicious Counsels, embraced this immediately. It was agreeable to his Inclination, and was sufficient to cause him to trample upon what Honour and Religion required of him, and to hinder him from reflecting on the ensuing Mischief. But, if it be strange, that France should so little regard his Word and Oath, there is no less reason to be surprised that such Principles should be maintained by the common Practice of him who filed: himself Chief of Faith.

Mean while, Henry laid out, in the Preparations for the War in Guienne, the Money granted by the Parliament for the Voyage to the Holy-Land. When all was ready, he came to Portsmouth, where his Troops were ordered to meet him. Then leaving the Regency to the Queen and Prince Richard, he set sail (6) attended by a great Number of Lords, who being his military Tenants, were obliged to that Service. Upon his Arrival at Bourdeaux, he headed 1253. his Army and besieged Reale Castle then in the Hands of the Rebels. As they depended upon the King's usual Indulgence, they neglected to fortify the Places they had seized. By which means he easily became Master, not only of this, but of all the other Castles that were in their Power. Mean while the King of Castile neglecting to support his Adherents, Henry imagined he waited for his Departure to raise fresh Commotions in the Province, and was afraid that would be always the Case. This Belief made him very uneasy, because, to prevent his Enemy's Designs, he saw himself obliged to keep a standing Army in Guienne, without having wherewithal to maintain it. To free himself from this Difficulty, he dispatched an Ambassador to Spain, with Orders to propose a Marriage between Edward his eldest Son, and Eleanor Sister (1) of Alphonso King of Castile. Alphonso found there was no likelihood of his becoming Master of Guienne, since the Arrival of the English Succours. Besides, he considered the Marriage proposed was very advantageous for the Princess his Daughter. Accordingly, without much Solicitation, he agreed to it, and thereupon, resigned to Prince Edward all his Pretensions to Guienne (2). This Affair was transacted with great Secrecy, Henry intending to use the Pretence of the War to obtain a fresh Supply from the Parliament. Mean time, the Earl of Leicester, who was retired into France (3), finding Henry engaged in a War with the Gasccons, levied some Troops at his own Charge, and came and offered his Service. The Arrival of the Earl, and the Report of a private Treaty between Alphonso and the King, righthened the Rebels, and caused them to return to their Allegiance.

Mean time, Henry pretending to fear the Attacks of the Catholians, sent Orders to the Queen to summon a Parliament and demand an Aid. But this Attempt did not answer his Expectation. The Parliament, having some Intimation of the Treaty, negotiating in Spain, replied, all the Barons would be ready to serve the King with their Lives and Fortunes, upon the first News of his being invaded by the Catholians. This was not what the King wanted. However, as he thought the Treaty of Burgos was yet a Secret, he wrote to the Queen and Prince Richard, that he was extremely embarrassed, having received certain Advice that the King of Castile was preparing to invade Guienne with a numerous Army of *Moor*s. And therefore, he commanded them to press the Parliament (4) to grant an Aid answerable to his Necessities. But the News of the Treaty with Alphonso being confirmed by the Earl of Leicester, who was returned into England, the Queen durst not press the Parliament (5) upon so frivolous a Pretence. Henry, being thus disappointed, was forced to send Orders to the Prince his Brother to extort Money from the Jews at any rate. Richard discharged his Commission with such Rigour, that by his Oppressions he reduced the miserable Jews to desire leave to depart the Kingdom. But even that being refused them, they were forced to pay the King a greater Sum than ever.

As soon as the Queen had notice that her Son's Marriage was concluded, she hastened to Bourdeaux (6), with Edward and Edmund her sons, and the Archbishop of Canterbury. Immediately after her Arrival, Prince Edward was sent in great State to Burgos, where he married the Infanta Eleanor, and in a few Days set out again with his Bride for Bourdeaux, where the King and Queen waited for them. During their Stay in that City, the King confirmed by a new Patent, the Grant of Guienne to the Prince his Son, to which he added Ireland, and the Sovereignty of Hues (7). Henry having nothing more to do in Gascogne, prepared for his Departure. But to avoid the Fatigues of the Sea, he desired leave of the King of France, who had happily purchased his Liberty of the Infidels with a great Ransom (8), to pass through his Dominions, and embark at Bordeaux. Lewis not only very courteously granted his Request, but met him at Chartres, and conducted him to Paris, where he entertained him eight Days (9).

Henry made his Entry into London (10) with extraordinary Pomp, and received from the City a Present of a hundred Pound Sterling, which the Londoners were wont to give on the like Occasions. But as he did not seem satisfied, they gave him moreover, a rich Piece of Plate of exquisite Workmanship, with which he was content. This did not hinder him however from embracing an Opportunity a few Days after, to draw from the City a more considerable Sum. A certain Priest accused of Murder, escaping out of Newgate, where the Bishop confined him, the City was amerced in no less than three thousand (11) Marks as a Punishment for its Neglect. This Sentence was deemed the more unjust, as it was proved by good Evidence, that the Bishop's Officers themselves favoured the Prisoner's Escape (12).

I left the Emperor Conrade and Pope Innocent very hotly engaged in War. The Pope at length departed from Lyon to repair to Genoa, from whence he designed to go and relieve the City of Naples, closely besieged by Conrade. But this Resolution being taken too late, the Emperor had time to make himself Master of the Capital, and afterwards of all the rest of the Kingdom. This fortunate Success inspired him with the Thoughts of seizing likewise the Island of Sicily, and, if certain Histoians may be credited, he accomplished his Design by a notorious Treachery. It is said, that alluring to Melphi young Henry his Brother, to whom Frederic II bequeathed Sicily, he caused him to be murdered. This Prince, says an Historian of Naples, of all Frederic's Sons, was the worthiest and most hopeful.

Before the Death of the young Prince, the Pope, who saw his Affairs in great Confusion by Conrade's Progress, dispatched to England, the same Albert before spoken of, to offer the King the Crown of the two Sicilies. But Henry rejected this Offer on the account of his Nephew, whom he was unwilling to depose. Innocent not succeeding in this Project, took occasion from the Death of the King of Sicily, to renew Conrade's Excommunication, whom he charged with the Murder of his Brother. But the Emperor, whether he was innocent, or thought it would be difficult to convict him of this Crime, boldly denied it. Nay, he wrote to the King of England, and to express his extreme Grief thereat. This is not a proper place to examine whether his Sorrow was sincere. It suffices to observe, that in case he were guilty of the Murder, he did not long enjoy the Fruits of his Treachery. He died five Months after, poisoned, as was said, by a Physician bribed by Manfred his bastard Brother. Far from suspecting the Hand which gave him his Death, he left the Guardianship of his Son Conradin to the same Manfred.

The Death of Conrade in 1253, entirely changed the Face of Affairs in the two Sicilies. Manfred under Colour of acting for his Pupil, who was in Germany, formed the Project of becoming Master of the two Kingdoms. But he found so many Difficulties, that he was forced to conceal his Design till a more favorable opportunity. Mean time Innocent, who then resided at Provençe, headed an Army, and marched into the Kingdom of Naples, where the People declared in his Favor. Manfred himself, finding there was no opposing the Torrent, went to him at Naples. When he came there, he so artfully dissembled, that the Pope, thinking him really in his interests, admitted him to all his Councils, and confirmed to him the Emperor his Father's Grant of the Principality of Tarentum. Manfred, finding himself thus in the Pope's Favour, began to contrive how to make it subservient to his Designs. To that end, he advised him to disperse his Troops all over the Kingdom, and backed his Advice with two Reasons, by which Innocent suffered himself to be ensnared. The first was, the Necessity of easing the Inhabitants of Naples, left being too much burdened, they should think of revolting. His other Reason was grounded upon its being no less important to keep in Awe the *German*s, left by Conrade in the Country, under the Command of two Bavarian Princes. This Stratagem succeeding to his wish, he turned to the two German Princes, who probably were no more difficult to be deceived than the Pope. By means of some secret Emisaries, he intimated to them, that he was a Friend of Conradin's.

and only feigned out of Policy to adhere to the Pope. Then he magnified the Pope's Forces in the Kingdom, and advised them to go to Germany for Recruits. What further induced these two Princes to follow his Advice, was the Assurance he gave them, that in their Absence he would take care of their Troops. He told them, he would undertake to engage the Pope to furnish them with Necessaries, in Expectation of sending them back to Germany, and in the mean time, would prolong the Negotiation till their return. By this double Advice, Manfred weakened the Pope's Forces, by causing him to disperse them, and freed himself from the troublesome Presence of the two German Princes, keeping their Troops to be employed upon occasion.

The Army brought by Innocent into the Kingdom of Naples, could not be maintained without a great Expence, which he could not long bear. Apprehensive as he was, that his Troops would quickly disband themselves, if he did not find Money to pay them, he made a fresh Attempt upon the King of England, and with better Success than before. Under pretence of informing Henry of the Circumstances of his Nephew the King of Sicily's Death, he sent a Nuncio, to offer him in his Name the Crown of the two Sicilies for Prince Edmund his second Son. He represented to him, that his Scruples were no longer reasonable, since the Death of the young King his Nephew: That besides, he ought to consider this Offer as a very particular Mark of his Esteem and Affection, which any Prince in Europe would think a great Honour. In short, that a Crown was a Present to be accepted without much deliberation. These tempting Offers had the desired Effect. Henry, without consulting his Brother or the Parliament, from whom he was to expect the necessary Aids for this Undertaking, accepted this imaginary Present, with all Thankfulness. From that moment he caused Prince Edmund to assume the Title of King of Sicily. After this unwary Prince was rashly engaged in this Affair, he had never the Power or Prudence to get clear of the Snare laid for him by the Pope on that pretence. Innocent told him, that with an inconsiderable Sum of Money, he would have the Satisfaction to see, in a short time, his second Son on the Throne, and a Crown, like that of Sicily, was well worth taking some Pains to obtain. Pleased with these flattering hopes, Henry readily sent the Pope all his own Money, all that the Prince his Brother would lend him, and all that he could extort from the Jews or his other Subjects, by means of itinerant Justices sent into every County. But this not sufficing to satisfy the Pope, he was so very imprudent, as to oblige himself, under pain of being excommunicated and deprived of the Royal Dignity, to pay all such Sums as the Pope should borrow, for accomplishing their Enterprize. Innocent, empowered in this unlimited Manner, spared not his Friend's Purse. By Borrowings, real or pretended, he engaged him so deeply, that his ordinary Revenue could not possibly answer the Expence. This put him frequently under a Necessity of making such Demands upon the Parliament, as rendered him daily more odious to his Subjects. But he was so fond of this Affair, that he regarded not the Complaints and Murmurs of the People, as long as he thought to find the necessary Money for executing his Project.

Innocent was very sensible, it was not in the King's Power to perform his Engagements. But he hoped, by using the Plentitude of his Apostolical Authority, to furnish him with means sufficient to get Money from his Subjects. The first of these Means was a Bull directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Chester, empowering them to borrow Money of Persons of all Conditions, in the Name of the Church of Rome, with Orders to pay what Sums should be thus raised into the King's Hands. It is easy to see, the Pope made use of the Name of the Church of Rome, because he knew no body would lend the King Money; and because the Church had it in her Power to compel People, Ecclesiasticks at least, to lend their Money, which the King could not do.

The Voyage to the Holy-Land furnished the Pope with a pretence to grant the King two Tenths upon the Clergy. But withal he commanded the Money to be deposited in a safe Place, from whence it could not be taken but by his orders. He pretended it was to prevent the King from putting it to any other use than the Expedition to Palestine. But in reality these Sums were designed for the projected Conquest of Sicily. By a third Bull, he granted the King a twentieth part of the Church's Revenue in Scotland, provided the Money could be raised without giving Offence. Mean time, as he had himself engaged to contribute to the Charges of this intended Conquest, he promised to be answerable to Prince Edmund for a hundred thousand French Livres, half whereof should be paid upon his Arrival at Lym. A mighty Contribution towards an Enterprize of this Nature! However, the Obligation was clogged with this Clause, nam, si Rex should have occasion for the Money, he might for the Defence of the Holy See.

What Care sooner the Pope took to procure the King his Money, he was afraid it would not suffice, or the King would vainly lavish away the Treasure he should raise. For this reason he admonished him by a Letter, to retrench all superfluous Expences, not excepting those designed for pious uses, because the Conquest of Sicily was above all Works of Charity. Though Edmund as yet enjoyed only an empty Title, the King his Father, blinded with the hopes inflamed by the Pope, considered this young Prince, as the real Monarch of the two Sicilies. In this belief, he caused him to give, by an authentic Patent, to Thomas Earl of Savoy the Queen's Uncle, the Principality of Capua, which, like the rest of the Kingdom, was still in Dispute between the Pope and Conradin. But though the Pope seemed to divert himself of this Kingdom in favor of Edmund, he suffered him not however to dispose of any thing, without his Consent. There are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, several Grants made by the Pope, in this same Kingdom, to the Marquis of Brandenburg his General, and others.

Whilst the Pope continued his Negotiations in England, with all possible Secrecy, for fear of alarming the Sicilians, Manfred the Bastard was taking Measures at Naples to procure the Crown of the two Sicilies. He practised upon the German Troops brought thither by the Emperor Conradin, and secured the Assistance of the Saracens who were very numerous in the two Kingdoms. As soon as Matters were ripe, he waited an opportunity to declare himself openly, and it was not long before one offered. Having killed a Man that affronted him, at the Pope's Court, and being obliged to abscond, he was summoned to appear and take his Tryal. Upon his refusal, Innocent orders his Troops to march to the little Town of Nocera, inhabited by Saracens, where the Murderer was fled. This was a sufficient pretence for Manfred to assemble his Friends, who were already prepared. With the Succours that came to him from several Parts, he met the Troops that were marching against him, and attacking them with Advantage, between Troya and Foggia, killed part, and put the rest to flight. Innocent was much surprized at the Defeat of his Army, and to find upon his Hands a fresh Enemy whom he designed his Instrument to clear the Kingdom of the Germans. This Incident convinced him that Manfred had only amused him, he perceived, since the Germans sided with the Bastard, it would be difficult to maintain himself in the Kingdom with only his own Forces. In this belief, he repeated his Instances to the King of England, for Men and Money, with an English General, threatening in case of refusal, to give the Crown of Sicily to another Prince. But as this supply was yet very remote, the Vexation to see his Affairs in so ill a Situation, threw him into a Fit of Sickness which laid him in his Grave. Though most Historians reckon above a Year between the Death of Innocent IV, and the Election of Alexander IV his Successor, the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, plainly show that Alexander IV was elected a few Months after Innocent's decease. And indeed, we find there Bulls of these two Popes, dated the end of the same Year 1254.

Alexander, following the steps of his Predecessor, resolved to prosecute the War against Manfred, who, still concealing his Designs, declared for Conradin, for fear of fighting away the Germans, of whom he stood in great Need. As the Pope had no less occasion for the Succours from England, instead of menacing Henry, as Innocent did, he sent the Bishop of Bononia, with a Ring to invest by that Mark, Prince Edmund with the Kingdom of Sicily. But whilst the Legate was on the Road, Alexander's Affairs were entirely ruined. The Pope borrowing Money from all Hands, on the King of England's Account, found means to draw together an Army of sixty thousand Men, and gave the Command to Conradin Ottavian Ubaldini Florimont, with orders to march against Manfred in Nocera. The Cardinal had sent his Lieutenant-General, the Marquis of Hainburgh a German, who had long served Innocent IV, but was now corrupted by Manfred. Upon the Approach of this Army to Nocera, the Marquis, who watched an opportunity to do Ottavian in some false Step, repented to him, that it was not only needless, but a losing of his Honor, to employ so great an Army against a paltry Town. Adding, the Country adjoining afforded no Forage, that besides, it was plain, Manfred could make no Stand there, since he kept himself thus unmolested. The Cardinal General, unexperienced in the Art of War, and the Marquis as an able and faithful adviser, were both 1255. persuaded to divide his Army, on the false Notion of his Enemy's being afraid. He had no sooner committed this Error, but Manfred failed out of Nocera, and suddenly falling upon the Army which was coming to besiege him, entirely put them to rout. The Pope's loss in this Action was so great, that he was forced to abandon the Country. So Manfred easily became Master of the two Sicilies, and was crowned at Palermo, after spreading a Report that young Conradin was dead in Germany.

Though Alexander had no refuge in Italy, yet he did not despair of restoring his Affairs by means of the King of England, who little knew of the late Revolution in a Country where he was so much concerned. For, the Bishop of Bononia (1) came to London, and, without mentioning what passed in the Kingdom of Naples, or Manfred's Coronation, invested Prince Edmund with the two Sicilies (2). This was done with a Solemnity, that increased Henry's Satisfaction. This weak Prince was as much pleased with the Ceremony, as if Edmund had been actually put in possession of a Crown. But if there were Flatterers, who congratulated him upon this Augmentation of Glory, there were wiser People, who grieved to see their King become more and more the Pope's Dupe. Indeed it was easy to perceive, he was engaging in an undertaking, which all the Ready-Money in the Kingdom would not suffice to accomplish.

Henry had little reason to expect any great Aids from his People, whom he had extremely displeased. Much less still could he hope to gain the Barons approbation of a Project, so rashly undertaken, without consulting those who alone could furnish him with means to come off with Honour. Nevertheless, he demanded of a Parliament summoned this Year (3), an Aid of Money, with the same Assurance as if he were labouring purely for the Good of the Publick. Though the Parliament was unconcerned about the Success of the Affairs of Sicily, they thought however to reap some Advantage from the King's Necessities, by improving this opportunity to procure, in a lasting manner, the observance of the two Charters. To that end, they told the King, they would grant him an Aid, upon these two Conditions; that the Charters should be observed, and the Justiciary, Treasurer, and Chancellor, nominated by the Parliament, without being liable to be turned out but by the same Authority. The King not thinking proper to agree to these Terms, prorogued the Parliament till Michaelmas.

In the mean time, Henry was obliged to take a Journey into Scotland, on account of the Queen his Daughter, who complained of her hard Usage from those that governed the Kingdom, during the King her Husband's Minority (4). The Presence of the King of England helped very much to settle the Affairs of that Kingdom, which began to feel the usual Effects of a Minority. He made but a short stay in Scotland, being impatient to return into England, where the Affairs of Sicily called him.

The Sums pretended to be borrowed by this, and the former Pope, for the Affairs of Sicily were so excessive, that the King saw it impossible to satisfy the Creditors, real or feigned. Alexander was not ignorant of it, but reckoning the English, and particularly the Clergy, were responsible for their Sovereign, he used all imaginable means to draw Money from the unfortunate Kingdom, so much exhausted already. His first Attempts were made by a Nuncio, one Rustand, whom he furnished with several Bulls, all tending to exact Money from the Clergy. The first, produced by the Nuncio, was an Order to gather a Tenth in England, Ireland, and Scotland itself, as well to the Pope's as the King's Use. This Bull was expressed in Terms which left the Clergy no room to cavil. The Pope laid this Imposition on them, Notwithstanding (5) any former Letters, Indulgences, Privileges, Exemptions or other Grants under any Form, and for what Cause soever, and notwithstanding all Objections which could be devised. A second Bull gave the Nuncio Power to change the King's Vow to go to the Holy Land, into that of undertaking the Conquest of Sicily; a Conquest according to the Pope, much more important than that of Jerusalem. Henry engaged in this new Vow, by a solemn Oath on the Relics of St. Edward, as he had done with regard to the first. Moreover, the Nuncio ordered a Crusade to be preached against Manfred, as an Enemy to the Christian Name, and promised the Pardon of their Sins to all that should assist the Holy See against that excommunicated Prince. The publishing of this Crusade was of little Consequence in England, but the Effects were felt in Palestine, as it obliged the Christians there, when they found the Succours, intended for them, diverted to other Uses, to conclude with the Saracens a Truce for ten Years.

The Parliament, that was prorogued, being met, the King solicited in vain for a Supply. He had taken care not to summon such of the Lords as shewed most Steadiness in the last Session. But from this very thing the Parliament took occasion to refuse his Demand. They alleged that, according to the Tenour of the Great Charter, they were not obliged to debate any Business, unless all that had a Right to sit in Parliament were summoned. Henry, seeing little hopes of procuring any Money from this Assembly, dissolved them, and took other Courses to attain his Ends (6). He would fain have borrowed once more of the Prince his Brother; but could not prevail. Richard was displeased that the King should rashly engage in this Affair without vouchsafing to consult either him, or the Barons of the Realm.

But what Henry could not do by his own Authority, he tried to effect by the Pope's help, who was the more ready to assist him, as his own Interest was concerned. It may be freely said, that in this unhappy Century the Court of Rome had lost all Sense of Shame. Of this, what I am going to relate is a clear Evidence, not built upon the Testimony of a single Historian, whose Fidelity some have endeavoured to call in question, but upon the very Bulls of Alexander IV., extant in the Records of England, as printed in the Collection of the Publick Acts. By the way, nothing can be more proper to confute whatever has been alleged to weaken the Authority of Matthew Paris, than the Harmony between the Bulls and his History. What is more strange in the Conduct of Alexander, is, that he did not even employ in the War against Manfred, the excessive Sums incessantly drawn from England, under that Pretence. If we compare together the Histories of England and Sicily, we shall find that when the Pope was draining England of Money for the projected Conquest, he suffered Manfred quietly to enjoy his Crown without using any effectual Endeavours to dethrone him. Thus the Conquest of Sicily was only the Pope's Decoy, to get large Sums from Henry, upon the vain expectation of placing his Son Edmund on the Throne. In the Collection of the Publick Acts, we find under the Year 1255, divers Bulls clearly shewing with what greediness the Roman Pontiff exhausted wretched England.

In one of these Bulls, he orders Henry to pay four thousand Pounds to the Bishop of Bononia, for the Charges of his Legateship, as if the Court of Rome had no Interest in the Affair.

In another dated the same Month, he confirms the Change of the King's Vow to go to the Holy Land, into that of an Expedition into Sicily, to the end the Money designed for the War against the Saracens, might serve to pay the Debts contracted for the Conquest of that Kingdom.

By one of the same kind directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he makes, by his Authority, the same Change with regard to the Vow of the King of Norway and his Subjects. Then he commands them to send into England, for the pretended Expedition to Sicily, the Money raised for the Voyage to the Holy Land.

A third, enjoins all the English, who have received any Money for their Journey to Palestine, to pay it into the Hands of certain Commissioners, to be employed in the Sicilian Expedition.

Though he had before confirmed the Change of Henry's Vow, he granted him however, by a Bull, the twentieth Part of the Clergy's Revenue in Scotland, to be employed in the Expedition to the Holy Land. This Bull bearing date after that, whereby the King's Vow was changed, must be considered as a real Cheat, to make the Scots believe, their Money should be expended in the War against the Infidels.

After this, by a subsequent Bull, he absolves the Scots from their Vow of going to the Holy Land, on condition they would send into England a certain Sum, to be employed in the Conquest of Sicily.

He granted the same Favour to the English, by a Bull, dated in August the same Year.

Lastly, By another in October, he commanded his Nuncio to compel the English Prelates, to pay the Tenth 1255. granted to the King, for the Payment of the Debt contracted since his Engagements with Innocent IV.

If the Originals of all these Bulls were not among the Records of England, it would be hard to believe that Christ's Vicar was so little of a Christian, as to prefer his own private Quarrel before the Cause of God; for the Crusades against the Infidels were then reckoned. Neither is it less strange, that Alexander should think of making the Scots and Norwegians, who live in the utmost Bounds of the North, contribute to the Charges of his Quarrel with the House of Swabia, about a Kingdom situated in the most Southern parts of Europe. But if what the Historian adds, be true, which however can scarce be doubted, it will be easy to perceive, that in order to raise Money, there was no means, though never so unjust, but what was approved by the Pope (1).

M. Paris.

The Sums borrowed in the King's Name amounted, according to the Pope's Account, to one hundred thirty five thousand five hundred and forty Marks, principal Money, besides Interest (2). Alexander was not ignorant that the King's Revenue scarce sufficed for his necessary Expenses, and consequently it was impossible to take from thence wherewith to satisfy the pretended Creditors. To help the King out of this Strait, he caused him to allow that all the extraordinary Levies of Money in his Kingdom should be applied to that Use, for which he undertook to find means himself to raise what Sums they should want. It was not so much the Purges of the People or Barons, as of the Clergy, that were to be drained. Besides that the Clergy had most ready Money, they more tamely submitted to the Pope, than the People would to the King. Accordingly, to oblige the Clergy to pay the greatest share of this Debt, Alexander made use of a very extraordinary Means, suggested to him by the Bishop of Hereford (3). He caused a great Number of obligatory Notes to be drawn, whereby each Bishop, Abbot, or Prior in England, acknowledged to have received of such a Merchant of Sienna, or Florence, or some other Place in Italy, the Sum of ———— (4), for the occasions of his Church, and bound himself to repay it at such a Time. This done, Endeavours were used to constrain each to sign one of these Notes, as if he had really borrowed the Money. This was such an Oppression, that it would be difficult to find an Instance of the like among the most famous Tyrants.

A strange Means used by the Pope to get Money of the Clergy. M. Paris. p. 913. &c. An. Barlow.

M. Paris. p. 915.

To execute this Design, Ruftand assembled all the Prelates of the Kingdom, and acquainted them with the Pope's Pleasure, that each should sign one of these Notes, and bind himself speedily to pay the Sum mentioned therein, under pain of Excommunication. This Proposal so surprized the Prelates, that the Bishop of London could not forbear saying aloud, That he would lose his Life rather than submit to so tyrannical an Oppression. The Bishop of Worcester said as much, and in fine, Ruftand had for Answer, That the Clergy of England would not be Slaves to the Pope. The Nuntio complained to the King of this bold Answer, intimating that the Bishop of London was the Author of the Clergy's Disobedience. Henry, who was no less exasperated than the Nuntio, fell into a great passion with the Bishop, and told him, since he was afraid neither of his, nor the Pope's Indignation, he should quickly feel the Effects. This Threat not being capable of daunting the Prelate, he replied, he was very sensible, the King and the Pope were more powerful than He, but in Case his Mitre were taken from him, he would clap a Helmet in its Place. However this Firmness was not capable to make the Nuntio give over his Project. By the help of the Bishop of Hereford, he sowed Discord among the Chief of the Clergy, by causing some, frightening others, and causing Accusations to be brought against some, from whence he took occasion to excommunicate them. These Censures were the more terrible, because, if within forty Days they sued not for Absolution, which could not be obtained but by submitting to the Pope's Will, all their Revenues were confiscated.

But what the King and Pope extorted from private Persons by these violent ways, could not amount to a Sum sufficient to answer their occasions. There was a Necessity of prevailing with all the Clergy to sign the Note, otherwise it was not worth the while to commit such flagrant Acts of Injustice. Wherefore Ruftand once more summoned the Prelates upon this Affair. But the Absence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was out of the Kingdom, and the Vacancy of the See of York (5), furnished the Prelates with a pretence to desire a Delay, which could not be refused them. They hoped that time would produce some favorable Turn to exempt them from paying the Money demanded. But the Conduct of the Nuntio quite destroyed these hopes. He fell into a Rage with those who raised any Difficulties in this Affair, and thought it very strange that the least opposition should be made to the Pope's Pleasure. Leonard, a Deputy or Procurator for the Clergy, insinuating on the Injustice of the Pope's Demand, Ruftand commanded him to say whether he spoke for himself, or in the Name of the Prelates. Then he wrote down the Deputy's Words, saying, he would inform the Pope of his insolent Expressions. Another Clergyman willing likewise to speak a little freely of this Matter, the Nuntio told him in a furious Tone, that if he had not a regard for the Prelates, he would not leave him a Hair on his Head.

The Delay granted the Clergy being expired, all the Prelates, with the Archdeacons, the Representatives of the inferior Clergy, assembled at London. As they met purely upon this Affair, Ruftand renewed his Instances the very first Day. The Clergy replied, by Leonard their Procurator, that their Poverty hindered them from consenting to the Pope's Demand, considering it was founded neither upon Reason nor Justice. The Nuntio made answer, There was no Injustice in what the Pope claimed, since as all Churches belonged to him, he could dispose of their Income as he pleased. This extraordinary Pretension was replied to by Leonard, saying, "Indeed all Churches might be said in some Sense to belong to the Pope, but it was only that he should protect and defend them, and not appropriate them to his own use. In like manner, continued he, as we say in England, all Things are the King's: Yet no Man ever imagined the King was Proprietor of all the Estates of his Subjects: So with regard to the Lands of the Church, it can never be proved that it was the Intention of the Founders to give them to the Pope." This Reply did but still more exasperate the Nuntio, who however thought not fit to argue and dispute any longer. He contented himself, with saying in a menacing Tone, "Let every one speak for himself, that the Pope may know who is for, and who against him." This he said to frighten them: But his violent Proceedings had a quite contrary Effect. The Prelates, full of Indignation at this Treatment, unanimously replied, they neither could, nor would submit to so unjust an Exaction, that this was their last Resolution, and they were ready to suffer Death in a Cause much more Just than that for which the Blessed St. Thomas Becket endured Martyrdom. The Nuntio finding there was no prevailing by Threats, grew more calm, and said, he would go himself and talk with the Pope about the Difficulties which occurred in the Execution of his Orders. The Clergy felt likewise, in their Name, the Dean of St. Paul's to acquaint his Holiness with the Reasons of their Denial. To finish at once this Affair, which I have no design to resume, I shall relate here what Terms the Clergy obtained from the Court of Rome, after long Solicitations. As the Pope pretended, the Sums in question were really borrowed for the Service of the King and Church, he ordered that each Prelate should pay his share in proportion to his Revenue: But that the Money thus paid, should be deducted out of the Tithes, which should hereafter be granted to the King. After this decision, refusing to hearken to any thing farther, the Clergy were forced to pay Money they had not borrowed, and to the payment whereof they were bound without knowing any thing of the Matter.

Some time after, the same Nuntio convened all the Abbots of the Cistercian Order, and demanded one Year's the Pope, upon this occasion, are these: "The sacred Privileges of Churches signify nothing; and though the Pope has a Power only for Edification, and not for Destruction, yet the Tax upon the Clergy, which was granted at first for three, is now changed into five Years; and formerly Laymen paid Tithes to the Clergy, but now even the Prelates are compelled to pay Tithes to the Laity: An Aid was granted in Succour of the King's Land, and we are compelled to pay it, to fight against the Christians of Apulia; A Tenth was also granted by us to the King, for the Obligation of the Great Charter, which now binding is not kept; besides many other Grievances then done to the Clergy and Church of England by the Pope's orders, though with the Privacy and Connivance of the King himself, too long to be here repeated," which, as J. Ford observes, though omitted by Dr. Brady, yet may serve to let us see the real Condition of the People, where the Prince, instead of defending them, gives them up for a Price to a foreign Power.

This Reply not satisfying the Italian Prelate, he fell into a Passion, and swore, if he could not prevail with them in a Body, he would so treat them singly, that they should be constrained to comply. He soon performed his Threat. For slight or imaginary Faults, he attacked them one after another, and caused them to be grievously fined. But this Order had such powerful Protectors about the Pope, that the Nuncio was commanded to desist.

The Tyranny exercised by the Court of Rome upon the Clergy of England, was of so strange a Nature, that the Historian, who relates all these Facts, was afraid he should be suspected of inventing them, unless he produced an authentick Proof. This doubtless was his view, in inserting at large in his History one of Alexander's Bulls, which shews, that nothing was done in the Business of the Notes but by his express Orders. This Bull, directed to Ruyland, concludes with these Words: You shall take care to let the King know that all this is our Will and Pleasure. Wherefore I set down in these Presents, what each Abbot and Prior shall be bound to pay. THE PRIOR and MONASTERY OF DURHAM, five hundred Marks; of BATH four hundred; of THORNEY, four hundred, &c. —Dated at Anagnina the X of the Calends of July, in the second Year of our Pontificate.

Let us return now to the King, who was soliciting with no less Earnestness for the Aids demanded of the Barons, to place the Prince his Son on the Throne of Sicily. The Archbishop of Messina was lately come from Rome on purpose, to second the King's Demand, with the Pope's Letters to the Lords, exhorting them to give the King Content. But the Pope's Eagerness, and the Archbishop of Messina's pressing Instances, proved quite contrary to their Designs. For it was very visible, that the Money was to be put into the Pope's Hands, otherwise he would not have taken such pains. Besides, the Parliament could not resolve to suffer Troops to be sent into Italy, as the Pope and the King desired, persuaded as they were, that it was exposing them to certain Ruin. These Considerations induced them to refuse the King the Aid he demanded. To justify their Denial, they presented an Address, setting forth their Reasons. I. The Difficulty of the projected Undertaking. II. The Poverty of the Nation. III. The dread of an Invasion from the neighbouring States, if the Forces of the Kingdom were sent so far off. IV. This Project was formed without the Consent of Parliament. V. Lastly, The Condition annexed to the Grant of Sicily, left the Pope free to revoke it whenever he pleased, which was reciprocal.

The King was not satisfied with demanding of his Parliament an extraordinary Aid. He would have moreover the Clergy stand bound to the Sums, the Pope pretended were still due to him (1), and consent that the Tenth granted for three, should be continued for five Years. These Demands were so exorbitant, that the Clergy could not resolve to comply with them. But there was not the same regard for the Spiritual, as for the Temporal Lords. The Pope no sooner spoke with an imperious Tone, by the Mouth of his Nuncio, but the Clergy tamely submitted, and gave the King the greatest part of his Demands.

How large Sums sooner were lately drawn out of the Kingdom, Henry still continued his Exactions, as well upon the Citizens of London, as the rest of the Kingdom. He made even the Welsh, whom he considered as his Subjects, since they were become his Vassals, feel the Effects of his Greediness. The Oppressions they endured, on divers pretences, wearing out their Patience, they had recourse to Arms, and invaded the Frontiers of England, from whence they carried away a great Booty. Prince Edward would have chastised them; but it was not possible for him to raise a sufficient Number of Troops to stop their Progress. The King's Treasury was so exhausted both by the Pope and his own Favourites, that not being able to furnish Money for this War, he was forced to suffer the Welsh to plunder his Borders with impunity. His fondness for his half Brothers, and the Queen's Relations was astonishing. He was not satisfied with loading them with immense Presents, which disabled him to defend his Kingdom, but permitted them to oppress his own Subjects, by forbidding the Chancellor to issue any Writs to their Prejudice (2).

Mean time the Pope was not yet content with the vast Sums drawn from England. He pressed the King continually to send him Money, threatening to revoke the Grant of Sicily, if he did not speedily perform what he had promised. Henry excused his not sending yet Troops into Italy, with an English General, because, instead of being able to defray this fresh Expence, he could not yet accomplish the Payment of the Sums demanded by the Pope. But to satisfy him in some measure, he remitted him five thousand Marks, and ordered Prince Edward his Son, who was to succeed him, to ratify the Agreements relating to Sicily. In another Letter on this occasion, he acquainted him that the Barons of the Realm refused to subscribe to the Terms that were required of him, thinking them somewhat unreasonable (3), especially since the Affairs of Sicily were altered by the Treachery of the Marquis of Ham-burch. As soon as the Pope heard that the Great Men began to murmur, he thought it time to get all he could expect from England, plainly foreseeing that the Game he was playing would soon be at an end. For that purpose, he sent into England a Nuncio, one Johs de Ditz, with several Bulls, all tending to procure Money of the King in order to pay the Pope's pretended Debts. By the first, he enjoined the Bishops punctually to pay the Tenth granted to the King, notwithstanding all Letters, Indulgences, or Privileges whatever. In all appearance, the Deduction, which they were before allowed to make, was rendered of no Effect by this Clause. Another Bull granted the King for his Voyage to the Holy-Land, from which he had already been exempted, all the Revenues of the vacant Benefices. By a third, he gave him the Incomes of Non-Residents. A Fourth, granted him the Tenth of all the Ecclesiastical Revenues of the Kingdom, according to their extended Value; whereas they were wont to be rated according to the ancient Taxations. A Fifth, ordered Ruyland to adjudge to the King the Chattels of Clergymen who died intestate. By a Sixth, he commanded the same Nuncio, to tax himself all the Ecclesiasticks of the Kingdom, for the Aid they were to give the King, notwithstanding all Privileges granted by his Predecessors, and all Exemptions, or Objections whatever. A Seventh, communicated all the Prebates who should not pay their Tenth within such a Time. There were several others which it is needless to mention, since they all tended to the same end. The Importunity of the Creditors of Sicily and Florence served always for a Pretence of these Oppressions. Tho' these Debts should have been over-paid by all the Levies of Money made in England on that account, they were like the Hydra, whose Heads continually revived.

It seemed that in this unfortunate Reign, a Concourse of malignant Influences met in England, to impoverish the Nation. Every thing contributed to their Misery, and Events seemingly the most remote, were found at length to tend to the same end. William, Earl of Holland and King of the Romans, being killed in a Skirmish with the Prisons, the Electors of the Empire were divided about the Choice of a new King of the Romans. Some, M. Paris, who were the Majority, gave their Votes for Richard, Brother to the King of England, and the rest chose Alphonso King of Castile. Richard, more diligent than his Competitor, went immediately to be crowned at Aix la Chapelle, and supported his Right by his Presence in Germany, whilst Alphonso acted only by Ambassadors. However, Richard had no other Advantage over his Rival but that of being crowned: An Honour, which cost him so dear, that Alphonso would have been very sorry to purchase it at that rate. Richard is said to carry into Germany seven hundred thousand Pounds Sterling in ready Money (4), an immense Sum in those Days, which added to what the Pope had drawn out of the Nation, made a very great Scarcity of Money. The meaner Sort of People were great Sufferers by it, because, the Harvest not being very plentiful, they were not able to buy Provisions, which were grown very dear (5). All these Evils moved not the King. Infatuated with his Sicilian Project, he pressed the Clergy for a fresh Aid, that of the last Year not even sufficing, as he assured them, to pay his Debts. As he expected to meet with great Opposition from the Prelates, he brought into the Assembly Prince Edward his Son, dressed in a Sicilian Habit, imagining that, charmed like him with the Sight, they would readily grant his Demands. But this Artifice would have been but of little Force, had not the Prelates again been awed by the Nuncio, who compelled them by his Threats to grant the King forty two thousand Pounds Sterling.

The Barons begin to take advantage of the King's Weakness.

To all the Calamities England laboured under during the Course of this Year, must be added the War with Wales, which was vigorously carried on by the Welsh, and very faintly by England. Prince Edward, who undertook to chastise these turbulent People, was forced to retreat before them with some Loss. Their daily Progress obliged the King to march against them. But, upon his Approach, they retired to their Mountains, having themselves laid waste their Borders, and thereby prevented Henry from proceeding. But this was not all. When he imagined the Welsh at a distance, and seized with Fear, they so effectually took Advantage of his Negligence, as to surprize him and cut in Pieces a good Part of his Army; after which, he thought only of retiring.

It must be surprizing, that at such a Juncture, Henry should think of frightening the King of France. However, without considering his weak Estate, he sent Ambassadors (1) to him, to demand the Restitution of Normandy, and the other Provinces in France taken from the English. It is not known, with what View or from what Motive he renewed this Pretension in so proud and haughty a manner, that one would have thought his Affairs in the most flourishing Condition, and that he was able to support this Bravado. Lewis, who was better acquainted with his Affairs than himself, forbore however to insult him, contenting himself, with roughly denying so unreasonable a Demand.

Mean time Ryeland the Nuncio, who was gone to Rome for new Instructions, soon returned into England, with Power to excommunicate the King, if, pursuant to his Engagements, he did not speedily undertake the projected Conquest. Henry, surprized at these Menaces, and not knowing which way to satisfy the Pope, caused his Son Edward humbly to intreat him, to make the Terms more easy on which he had accepted the Grant of Sicily. This Petition proving of no great Effect, Henry was at length forced to appoint Ambassadors to go to Rome, and renounce, in the Name of the Prince his Son, the Grant of this imaginary Crown, which had already cost him so dear. But this was not what the Pope wanted. Far from receiving this Renunciation, he sent a new Nuncio, one Arlot, empowering him to make some Alteration, in the Agreement upon this Affair. But withal he ordered him to use his utmost Endeavours, to engage the King more deeply, by procuring him some fresh Grants, which cost him nothing, since they were made at the Clergy's Expence. For that purpose, he charged his Nuncio to publish a new Bull, enjoining the Bishops to pay the Tenth granted to the King, under pain of Excommunication; notwithstanding all Objections, all Appeals, and all Letters obtained, or to be obtained to the contrary. What is more strange, and hardly conceivable, is, that the vast Sums sent to the Pope, not only had not at all promoted the Conquest of Sicily, but even the least part had not been put to that Use, since after the Defeat of Nocera, the Pope had no Army on foot. Besides the Tenth, and other Aids frequently paid by the Clergy to the King on this Account, the Parliament had furnished considerable Supplies, and yet there appeared no Bottom to this Gulf, which swallowed up all the Riches of the Kingdom. The Clergy grieved to see themselves thus oppressed: The People for their part murmured no less, when they considered, that so much Money was raised in England, and which it is affirmed, amounted to above nine hundred and fifty thousand Marks, was not sufficient to satisfy the Avarice of the Pope, who still craved for more (2).

It was not possible but so many Oppressions would at length wear out the Patience of the English. The Barons were still more aggrieved than the People, as the most considerable Posses, to which they thought themselves alone entitled, were enjoyed by Foreigners. This usually excites the Zeal of the Great Men, and makes them such mighty Sticklers for the Good of the Publick. If their own private Interest is not concerned, in vain will it be expected that the Nobles expose their Lives and Fortunes in Defence of the Liberties of an injured People. This is a Remark, at which no Nation in particular ought to be offended, since it agrees with all times and with all Places. The Great Men, who then lived in England, were of the same Character. The Credit and Riches of the Foreigners, were the chief Grievance of the Barons, and the real Motive of their Complaints. If they urged some other Abuses, it was because they themselves had no Advantage from thence, or to gain the People to their Side. They had hitherto thought to oblige the King to alter his Conduct, by binding him with solemn Oaths. But they perceived at length there was no securing this Process, as M. P. an Historian flies him, unless more violent means were used. In this Belief, they began to hold secret Conferences together, to consult of proper Expedients to reform the Government, and especially, to exclude the Foreigners. The King quickly furnished them with an Opportunity to execute their Designs, by calling a Parliament (3), of whom he demanded, according to Custom, a powerful Aid for the Affair of Sicily; for as to the Voyage to the Holy Land, it was no longer mentioned. The Parliament, pursuant to the Resolution already taken by the principal Barons, instead of granting his Demand, vehemently complained of the Breach of his Promises, and of all the Grievances in general, spoken of in the Course of this Reign. Henry perceiving, that a haughty Carriage would be in vain on this Occasion, fell to his old Artifice of appealing the Lords, by acknowledging himself guilty, and promising to reform what was amiss. But for once they were not so credulous. They told him plainly, that without leaving it to him, they designed to reform the Government themselves, so as to fear no more his Breach of Faith. Therefore, under pretence of the Difficulties in this Affair, the Parliament was prorogued, and the City of Oxford appointed for the Place of the next Session. And as he was apprehensive, that in the mean time, the Barons would make Preparations, which he found he could not prevent, he gave them a positive Promise, that as soon as they met, he would join with them in the desired Reformation. He signed likewise a Charter, whereby he consented, that the Articles to be reformed, should be drawn up by four and twenty Lords, of whom he should chuse Twelve, and promised to observe whatever should be settled by these Commissioners. To give the greater Authority to this Charter, he caused Prince Edward his Son to sign it with him, to convince them of his Sincerity. They had been so often deceived by the like Promises, that they could not believe this to be more sincere. Without relying on the King's Protestations, the Barons summoned all their military Tenants, and on the Day appointed, came to Oxford (4), well attended and resolutely bent to compel the King to perform his Word. The first thing was the Election of the four and twenty Commissioners, who were to draw the Articles of the intended Reformation. The King chose Twelve (5), and the other twelve were elected by the Barons (6), among whom made Simon de Montfort Earl of Leicester, President of this Council. The Election being over, the four and twenty drew up some Articles, to which the Parliament referred to themselves a Power to add from time to time, such others as should be deemed necessary for the Good of the State. They were in Substance as follows:

I. That the King should confirm the great Charter, which he had sworn so often to observe without any Effect.

II. That the Office of Chief Justiciary should be given to a Person of Capacity and Integrity, that would administer Justice, as well to the Poor as the Rich, without Distinction.

III. That the Chancellor, Treasurer, Justices, and other Officers and publick Ministers should be chosen by the Four and Twenty.

IV. That the Custody of the King's Castles should be left to the Care of the Four and Twenty, who should intrust them with such as were well affected to the State.

V. That it should be Death for any Person of what Degree or Order soever, to oppose, directly or indirectly, what should be ordained by the Four and Twenty.

VI. That the Parliament should meet at least once every Year, to make such Statutes as should be judged necessary for the Welfare of the Kingdom (7).

It is commonly said that the Countess of the King of France, stayed in France, according to the new Valuation, without any Donation or Allowance. But the Parliament thinking the Demand extravagant, agreed to grant the King, in Aid of fifty thousand Marks, on condition the great Charter was confirmed. But Henry refused to accept of it. 1258. It is certain that twelve Deputies, or Representatives of the Commons, were present in this Parliament: but whether it was by Permission, or Right, I mean whether it was a new Regulation, or the Commons had their Representatives in the former Parliaments, is what I dare not undertake to determine; since the English are not agreed in this Point among themselves. However, as in a Dispute of this Nature, it is difficult to help inclining to one Side, I readily own myself of their Opinion, who believe this to be the first time that the Representatives of the Commons were admitted to sit in Parliament. And indeed, if the Commons had a Right to sit there at the time we are speaking of, it would be very strange, that they should nominate but twelve Representatives for the whole Kingdom. Moreover, all the Historians agree that these Twelve were not Commoners [as now reputed] but all Barons, filled immediate Tenants of the Crown (1). Add to this, it would be very surprising, if the Commons enjoyed this Privilege before, that Historians should never distinguish them from the Nobility. And yet, among so many Writers, who, from the Conquest to the end of the Reign of Henry III. have spoken of Parliaments, not one has distinguished the Commons, as making a distinct Body, or separate House from the Barons. In short, it may be added, as a Precedent, by no means favourable to the Antiquity of the Right of the Commons, that in France it was not till the Reign of Philip the Fair, that the third Estate was admitted into the General Assembly of the States, as Paquier assures us. However this be, as it is from this and another Assembly, which I shall mention presently, that some date the Original of the Privilege of the Commons, it was necessary to acquaint the Reader therewith.

The Parliament approving the Articles drawn by the Four and Twenty, the King was obliged to give his Assent to them, and cause all necessary Orders, for putting them in Execution, to be dispatched. Prince Edward likewise solemnly swore to observe, and cause them to be observed, to the utmost of his Power. Thus Henry, for his too great Neglect of his Subjects, found himself at last forced to divide with them the Government of his Kingdom, or rather to resign the whole into their Hands. Perhaps he would have avoided this Misfortune, had he been less obsequious to the Court of Rome, which certainly was the principal Cause of his Disgrace. But it was then very difficult to keep, in that respect, a just Medium. King John lost himself by too vigorously opposing the Pope, and Henry by making himself his Slave.

The Articles agreed on, then called the Statutes or Provisions of Oxford, met at first with some Opposition. The Earl of Warren refused to sign them. Prince Edward, who swore to them against his Will, wanted to go from his Oath. Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, openly protested, they were of no Force, till the King his Father, then in Germany, consented to them. This Protestation drew a very mortifying Reply from the Earl of Leicester. Without regarding his Quality, the Earl plainly told him, if the King his Father refused to join with the Barons, he should not enjoy one Inch of Land in England. But the greatest Opposition was from the Foreigners, and particularly the King's Half-Brothers, and the Queen's Relations. Especially William, Bishop elect of Valence, was chiefly concerned, because the whole Royal Authority, now reduced within narrow Bounds by these Statutes, was properly in his Hands. Accordingly, he publicly declared, he would not deliver up the Castles, of which he had the Custody. But the Earl of Leicester, who was naturally impetuous, immediately replied, he would part either with the Castles or his Head. This Threat being supported by the rest of the Barons, the Peitevins resolved to shut themselves up in Winchester, plainly seeing they were not able to withstand the Torrent. Their Flight (2) was no sooner known, but the Barons mounted their Horses and pursued them, but it was not possible to overtake them. However, as at such a Juncture, it was difficult for Foreigners, to universally hated as they, to procure a sufficient Protection, they consented to depart the Kingdom, provided they might have a Safe-Conduct. This Condition being readily complied with, they were brought to London till they could be embarked. It is affirmed, that during their stay in the City, they invited to an Entertainment several Lords, some of whom died presently after; which gave occasion to suspect, they were poisoned. But it may be, the Hatred of the English to these Foreigners, was the chief Cause of this Suspicion. Be that as it will, a few Days after, they embarked at Dever, and returned into their own Country.

The Barons being thus rid of the Foreigners, agreed before their Separation, upon an Oath of Association, to stand by the Provisions of Oxford with their Lives and Fortunes (3). If we believe an Historian who has given us the Particulars of this Affair, the Four and Twenty soon abused their Power, in giving all the Places and Offices to their Relations and Friends. He accuses them also of holding frequent Parliaments, without the King's Consent, whom they considered only as the Shadow of a Sovereign.

In a Parliament assembled at Winchester, the Barons resolved to send Commissioners to the City of London, to invite them to join in their Association. This was easily obtained; the Londoners having still more reason to complain of the King than all the rest of the Kingdom. This Affair being ended, and the Parliament judging it necessary to proceed in a legal way against the Foreigners, who were expelled the Kingdom, passed an Act for their perpetual Banishment. However, as Abelmar Bishop of Winchester was in the number of the Banished, there was a necessity of making some excuse to the Pope, since the Bishops had been long exempted from the Civil Jurisdiction. There was occasion likewise to justify to the Pope the Conduct of the Parliament, both with regard to the Affair of Sicily, and the late Alterations in the Government of the Kingdom. It was resolved therefore, that the Barons should write to the Pope, to inform him of what had passed. Their Letter was to this Effect: "That they had been prevented, for several good Reasons, from yielding to his Admonitions, with respect to the Conquest of Sicily. First, because the King had engaged in that Undertaking, without their Advice, and without considering the State of the Kingdom, which was by no means able to bear the Expence of such an Expedition. Secondly, because the Conditions on which the King had accepted the Grant of Sicily, for the Prince his Son, were too hard and impracticable. Nevertheless, if the Pope would mitigate them, they were ready to prosecute that Affair, to the utmost of their Power. Then, they vindicated the Oxford Provisions, alleging the King's Incapacity and Enfeebled to give himself up to the Guidance of such, as had no concern for the good of the Kingdom. They insisted chiefly upon this, shewing by strong Reasons, that it was not proper the Kingdom should be governed by Foreigners. They mentioned the Bishop of Winchester in particular, as the principal Author of the Evil, England laboured under. They affirmed, This Prelate was guilty of divers enormous Crimes, which induced him to desire leave to depart the Kingdom, being conscious he could not possibly render a good Account of his Actions. Above all, they accused him of advising the King to break his Word and Oath, which could not but be construed as a settled Design to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. And therefore, they would never suffer him to return again, and supposing they did, the People were bent to oppose it." To give the more Weight to their Apology, they sent their Letter to the Pope by the Hands of some of their own Body, who were commissioned, to display more fully the Outrages of the Bishop of Winchester, and the rest of the Royal Relations (4).

The Pope was not satisfied with these Reasons. He wanted to continue to draw Money from the King, on the old pretence of the Business of Sicily; and what the Barons had lately done laid an insuperable Obstacle in the way of his Designs. However, not to exasperate them, he delayed sending an Answer; and contented himself with privately assuring the King of his Protection.

(1) In the same Article is the Act for the Election of the Twelve, which was drawn up in French in this Form: "Be it remembered, that the Community have on this twelfth Writs Men, who shall come to Parliaments, as also at other times, when there shall be need, and the King or his Council shall command us to send to them, to consult the Bishops of the King and Realm; and the Community will have it established, what time Twelve shall be; and that shall be done to spare the Cost and Charges of the Community." The Names of the Twelve are entered in the last Article thus: "These are the Twelve who are chosen by the Barons to treat in the three Parliaments every Year with the King's Council, for the whole Community of the Land, upon the Common Business; namely, the Bishop of London, the Earl of Winchester, the Earl of Hertford, the Bishop of Bath, the Bishop of Bristol, the Bishop of Gloucester, the Bishop of Hereford, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of Nottingham, the Bishop of Salisbury, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Bishop of Exeter." Baron, p. 413. Now all these were Barons.

(2) They fled away privately, while the Barons were at Dinner, in order to take Refuge with their Brother the Bishop of Winchester. M. Paris. (3) You may see the Form of the Association in the Annals of Burton, p. 413, and likewise of the Oath the Four and Twenty were to take. Ibid. (4) To this Letter eleven great Men put their Seals, and witnessed it in the Name of the whole Community. Eight of them were of the Number of the Four and Twenty, and the other three were William de Foris, Earl of Albemarle; Peter de Savoy, Earl of Russmond; and James Audley. This Letter was carried by four illustrious and elegant Knights, who added many other Crimes committed by the Bishop of Winchester and his Brothers, namely, Homicide, Rape, Oppression, and Injury, and that Gregory de Luffham, one of the Brothers, roasted the King's Cook, and tortured him to death. M. Paris.

1260. Richard set out for Germany, where he had some Expectations of being owned for Emperor by all the Electoral Princes. But quickly finding, it was not in his Power to dispel the Factions that divided the Germans, he relinquished this Project, and returned to England. Here he found the King and Queen of Scotland, who were come to visit the King. A few days after, arrived also John de Dreux Duke of Bretagne, to espouse Beatrix the King's second Daughter, so that the Court was very numerous. Though the Governors had no great regard for the King's Person, they however did honor to his Royalty, by a magnificent Reception of these illustrious Guests. But it was with little satisfaction to Henry, who, not having the management of his Revenues, could not value himself upon the good Reception his Son-in-law met with at his own Court (1).

Though Henry had no great Soul, he was sensible however of the Mortifications he daily received. He even sought means to free himself from the Yoke laid on him, but had none about him to advise with. In this Perplexity he privately invited Abelnar his Brother, Bishop of Winchester, who was gone to Rome (2), to return to England. He hoped his Character, and the Pope's Protection would screen him from the Persecutions of the Barons. The Bishop was now on the Road for England, where he would doubtless have caused great Disturbances, had not Death seized him at Paris. The Barons were overjoyed at the News, because they were thereby freed from no little uneasiness. And indeed, they could not have denied him Entrance into the Kingdom, as they had resolved, without breaking entirely with the Pope.

This Accident hindered not the King from pursuing his Design, of throwing off the Barons Yoke. The unexpected Breach, between the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, who were only outwardly reconciled, putting him in hopes of succeeding in his Project, he desired the Pope to absolve him from his Oath concerning the Oxford Provisions. His Holiness readily granted him this Favor, it being no less his own than the King's Interest, to alter a Government so prejudicial to him. But Alexander dying before the Dispensation could be sealed, he was forced to stay till the Holy See was filled. Urban IV, who was promoted to the Papal Throne, being as compliant as his Predecessor, Henry soon pulled off the Mask. The Parliament being assembled at London, he suddenly repaired thither, without acquainting any one with his Design, and plainly told them, "That before he was made to sign the Oxford Provisions, they had obliged themselves to pay his Debts, and increase his Revenue; and since neither of these Articles had been performed, he did not look upon himself as bound to keep his Word." He added, "That he no longer intended to make use of the Counsellors imposed upon him, and who treated him rather like a Slave than a King."

After this brief Declaration, he retired to the Tower, the Governor whereof he had gained, and seized upon all the Treasure lodged there (3). This first Step being taken, he turned out by Proclamation all the Officers and Magistrates chosen by the Four and Twenty, and nominated others in their room. In short, he shewed by his whole Conduct, that he was resolved to reign with the same Liberty, as before the Parliament of Oxford.

Prince Edward, then at Paris (4), having notice of what passed in England, returned with all speed, to endeavour to prevent the impending Evils. He sufficiently knew the King his Father to have Reason to fear, he had proceeded without taking proper Measures, and his Fears were not groundless. The Barons impatiently waited his Return, in Expectation, that being more knowing than the King, he would apply himself warmly to prevent the mischief the Kingdom was threatened with. To prepare the way for him, they presented an Address to the King, praying him to observe his Oath, and offering on their part, to amend such Articles as should be found too severe upon him in the Oxford-Provisions. Henry, pretending nothing could be done till his Son's Arrival, returned no Answer to this Proposal, which by no means agreed with his Projects. He was no less impatient than the Barons, to see the Prince, in hopes he would strengthen his Party. But he was extremely surprized, when he found, the Prince, at his Return, openly blamed him for breaking his Word. He was thunderstruck at this, which was followed by something still more grievous. The Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, upon whose Diffidence he relied, were sincerely reconciled, to prevent their common Ruin, and swore once more to the Oxford-Provisions, and thence the Barons Party being considerably strengthened in this Union, they sent the King word, if he would not voluntarily remove from about his Person all Evil Counsellors, they would find means to compel him. This weak Prince, who had rashly engaged in an Undertaking which he saw he could not go through with Honor, chose to return them no Answer. Mean time, he continued in the Tower, from whence he durst not stir, for fear of being delivered into their Hands.

In this ill Situation, he saw no other Remedy, but to treat with the Barons. He perceived his Condition would be but more unhappy, if he vainly persisted to prosecute his Design. Matters even seemed to be in a fair way, by the Concessions of both Parties. But this Prospect lasted not long. Henry thinking to make his Cause better, by urging the Pope's Authority, gave occasion to widen the Breach, by inadvertently shewing the Bull, which absolved him from his Oath. The Discovery of this Secret, which he ought to have concealed at such a Juncture, did him an irreparable Damage. The Barons, who till then were in hopes to bring him to equitable Terms, resolved to lay aside all Ceremony. They plainly saw, there was no reliance upon an Accommodation, to which the most solemn Oath could give no manner of Force. Pursuant to this Resolution, they formed a Design to surprize the King in Winchester, where he was gone in hopes that the Negotiation on foot would have a good Issue. But Henry receiving timely notice, retired again to the Tower. As soon as he found himself safe, his first Care was to send into all the Counties, Orders, to turn out the Sheriffs appointed by the Four and Twenty, which caused a general Confusion in the whole Kingdom. Some were for obeying the Sheriffs nominated by the King, whilst others refused to acknowledge them (5).

Mean time, the Barons continuing to take measures to oppose the King's Designs, prevailed with the Governors of the Cinque-Ports to fit out a Fleet to guard the Coast, lest Succours should come from some Foreign Prince. The Cinque-Ports were obliged by their Charter to equip fifty Men of War whenever the King's Service required it (6). Upon this occasion, the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, interpreting the King's Service by that of the Kingdom, pretended to serve the King, by making use of their Forces against him. This Maxim will not appear very strange, when it is considered, that in England the King and the State have always been deemed but one and the same Body. Upon this Foundation it is affirmed, that when the King comes to separate his Interests from those of the Publick, he loses his Prerogatives, which are rather the Prerogatives of the Crown, than of the Sovereign's Person.

Every thing manifestly tended to a Civil War. But the Fear every one of both Parties were under of rendering his Condition worse, suspended the Effects of their mutual Enmity. Whilst the King and the Barons were equally desirous to avoid the Blame of beginning the War, the King of the Romans improved this Disposition, to try to procure a good Peace. His Mediation being accepted, he prevailed with the King his Brother, to promise, that he would confirm the Oxford Provisions, and with the Barons to depart from such Articles as were most displeasing to the King. In all Appearance, the Four and Twenty were then deprived of their Authority, and more, because from the Beginning of the Troubles it was not generally acknowledged. The Earl of Leicester refused to consent to this Agreement, and chose to retire into France. He said, he durst not rely on the word of a Prince, who senupled not to break his Oath, when he found it for his Interest. Among the

(1) About this time also there was held a Parliament, where a new Judiciary, Chancellor, and Treasurer, were appointed by the Barons, in the Place of those that were enter fully dead, or had resigned; as Nicholas, Archdeacon of Ely, was made Keeper of the Great-Seal; the Abbot of Peterborough, Treasurer; and Hugh de Eborac, Chief-Justiciary. (5) The Writ or Letters issued out by the King on this Occasion, are upon Record, and printed in Dr. Brady's Appendix, No. 205. The Substance of them was, "That the Barons not having performed their Part of the Oxford Provisions, he had got himself absolved by the Pope from his Oath to observe them. That he was ready to give Justice to all Men in his Courts, and to keep the Articles of the Great Charter, and Charter of Forest; which the Sheriffs were ordered to proclaim in all places, &c."

(6) From hence may be seen the great Power of the Cinque-Ports in those Days, to which the chief Guard of the Kingdom, by Sea, was then committed, and which found the King no less than a Fleet of fifty Sail, each Town according to its proportion; and this they were to do for the Privileges they enjoyed.

1261. Barons who signed this Agreement, there were several no less dissatisfied with it. But as the Majority gave their Consent, they chose rather to accept it, than be deemed alone the Cause of the Troubles. By this Treaty, England seemed to be restored to its former Tranquillity. But the Fire which lay concealed under the Cinders, soon re-kindled, and burst out into new Flames.

Henry's fall to Guienne. During the Calm, which Henry hoped long to enjoy, the Affairs of Guienne obliged him to go over to Bourdeaux (1), where falling ill of a Quartan Ague, he stayed longer than he designed. Richard Earl of Gloucester dying in the mean while, his Son Gilbert immediately repaired to Guienne, to be invested with his Father's Inheritance. Henry having no kindness for that Lord, was solicited some time before he would do him that Justice. And it was not till after receiving a considerable Present, that he lent him away satisfied.

The King's Absence afforded Leicester's Friends an Opportunity to renew their Cabals, and unite the Party divided by the late Treaty. They compassed their ends the more easily, as the King gave the Barons a plausible Pretence to complain, by delaying to confirm the Oxford Provisions. When the Earl of Leicester was informed that this Party began to revive, he speedily returned into England, where his Presence entirely restored the Courage of those who, out of Fear or Weakness, had signed the late Agreement (2). Upon this the King came over in great haste, but it was now too late. The Barons had resolved to put themselves in a Condition not to fear his Inconstancy. Immediately after his Return, they presented an Address to him, calling upon him to confirm the Statutes of Oxford, pursuant to his Agreement, and threatening, in case of Refusal, to take such Measures as would not be agreeable. They were in hopes, that Fear would oblige him to grant their Demand, and it was a great Surprise to them to find themselves called Rebels, and threatened with the severest Punishments. It will doubtless seem strange, that the King, in his present Circumstances, should behave thus haughtily. But he had a Private Reason 1261. He gained his unknown to the Barons. During his Voyage to Guienne, he had gained the King of the Romans and Prince Edward. The latter had now raised some Foreign Troops, under colour of employing them against the Welsh, but in reality to oppose them to the Barons. The War however, did not break out so soon. There were still some Negotiations, but which served only to widen the Breach, and give the Barons time to prepare themselves. During this Interval, Edward carried the War into Wales, where however, he did nothing considerable, for want of Money to pay his Troops. In this sad Situation, the Prince not being able to resolve to disband his Army, and not having wherewithal to satisfy them, he thought he might use some extraordinary Method to raise the Money he wanted. Urban threatened Henry to give Sicily to another. Ad. Pub. T. 1. p. 796. Whilst these things passed in England, Urban IV, altered his Measures with respect to Sicily, and took no care to give any notice to Henry. The Revolution in England, causing him to consider that Kingdom as an exhausted Fund, he turned to France, and entered into a Negotiation with Charles Earl of Anjou, to place that Prince on the Throne of Sicily. To prepare Henry for this Change, he wrote him a long Letter, wherein, after Reproaches for what the Holy See had done for him, he complained of the Non-performance of his Promises. In short, he let him know, he should be forced to seek another Prince for speedier and more effectual Supplies.

The beginning of the Barons War. T. Wikes. Mean time the Negotiation between the King and the Barons was still continued: But proceeded very slowly, both Parties having no other Intention but to lay upon each other the Blame of the Rupture. At length the Earl of Leicester, fearing all these Delays would only tend to corrupt his Adherents, convened an Assembly of the Barons, where it was unanimously resolved to maintain the Oxford Provisions by Arms (3). This Resolution being taken, they chose the Earl of Leicester for General, and each went and drew together the Troops which were already prepared in the Uncertainty of the Success of the Negotiation. The Foreigners, dispersed in the Kingdom, were the first that felt the sad Effects of this Rupture. The People were so exasperated against them, that, without distinguishing the innocent from the guilty, they persecuted all alike that could not speak good English, that Mark alone being sufficient to render them odious. On the other hand, the Earl of Leicester plundered without Mercy the Estates of the King's Favorites and Counsellors, and publicly declared, he would hearken to no Proposals of Peace, till they were all entirely destroyed (4). As the King had no Army to withstand the Barons, he still remained in the Tower of London, whilst they became masters of Gloucester, Hereford, Bridgworth, Worcester and other Places near the Severn. These Conquests were followed with the Declaration of the City of London in their favour. The Londoners eagerly embracing the Opportunity of being revenged of the King, sent him word, they were resolved to adhere to the Oxford Provisions, and to shut their Gates against the Foreigners, in case he should think of bringing any into the City.

Though these happy Beginnings gave the Barons great reason to hope well of their Enterprise, they believed, that to gain the People still more to their Side, it was necessary to shew, they had taken up Arms with Grief, and were ready to lay them down with Joy. To that end, they presented to the King a Petition drawn up in very respectful Terms, wherein they offered to consent, that a free Parliament should review the Oxford Provisions, and annual Acts as were found too prejudicial to the Royal Authority. But whilst, they desired, that the King should confirm the rest, and the Kingdom be governed by the Natives, as was practised in all other Countries. This Petition had no effect upon the King, who, though blocked up as it were in the Tower, expected every Moment the Prince his Son to come and relieve him. This too was what the Barons feared; and therefore to prevent the Designs of Prince Edward, they post themselves at Thistleworth, through which place he must necessarily pass to deliver the King. The Barons' precaution caused the King to alter his Resolutions. As he began to feel himself being relieved, he found himself obliged to send them Word, he would confirm the Provisions of Oxford. This was all the Barons wanted, so that a treaty containing four principal Articles, was easily concluded, namely (5). I. That the King's Castles should be put into the Hands of the Barons. II. That the Provisions of Oxford should be inviolably observed. III. That all Foreigners, except such as should be allowed of by the unanimous Consent of the Barons, should be banished the Realm. IV. That the Administration of Affairs should be committed to the King's natural Subjects, approved of by the Barons.

This Agreement would have restored Peace to the Kingdom, had the King consented to it with design to perform it. But as his sole View was to free himself from his troublesome State, it was not long before he broke it. The Infidelity of some Londoners did not a little contribute to his taking this Resolution. One Day, as the Queen was going by Water to Windsor, the Mob, just as she was going to shoot the Bridge, hollered at her in a manner very mortifying to a Queen. They not only set upon her by foul Reproaches, but some were so brutish as to cast Dirt and Stones at her (6). The King was extremely incensed at this Insult, and it served to confirm him in his Resolution, of making a vigorous Effort for the Recovery of his Authority. He began therefore to store with Arms and Provisions the Castles that were still in his Power, which was a sufficient hint to the Barons, to be upon their Guard.

Matters standing thus, it was hard to say whether the Kingdom was in Peace or War. Though Hostilities

(2) Upon his Arrival, the Earl appeared at a great Council held by Philip Basset the Justiciary, and produced a Bull from the Pope, wherein he confirmed the Provisions of Oxford, and recalled the King's Absolution, declaring he was decided in favour of it. This Bull was publicly read in the Church, contrary to the Will of the Justiciary, (first put in by the King) but as soon as the Earl had published it, he went to the Tower. The Page is found in no other Writer, except the Manuscript Chronicle of St. Augustine; and it true, gives us the Reason of the Pope's Claims, and the Cause of his Humour, from what it was in the beginning of this Year, and shews the Cause of what happened the next, as will be seen hereafter. But if the Absolution was recalled, it was shortly after re-confirmed.

(3) And further, according to the City Annals, they sent a Letter, (sealed by the Lord Roger Clifford, in the Name of the city) to petition his Majesty, to confirm the Provisions of Oxford, and send all those that opposed them, the King, Queen, and their Councilors, except such as should be allowed of by the King's Council, to come to an Agreement.

1263. were not yet begun, the Distrust on both Sides was so great, that the two Parties looked upon one another as real Enemies; each being ready to take what Advantages should offer. During this State of uncertainty, Prince Edward thought it necessary to strew with Provisions Bristol Castle, of which the King his Father had entrusted him with the Custody. To that end, he came to Bristol, and would have obliged the Citizens to find him what Provisions he wanted. As People then stood disposed, this Demand, made perhaps a little too haughtily, raised a Sedition among the Townsmen, which forced the Prince to retire hastily into the Castle. He was no sooner there, but the Inhabitants resolved to besiege him; or at least, to keep him so closely blocked up that he should not escape, well knowing that, for want of Necessaries, he could not long resist. This Resolution threw Edward into a very great Straight. He got out of it however by a Device, which indeed freed him from the present Danger, but soon brought him into another, from whence he could not so happily disengage himself. He sent for the Bishop of Worcester, and intimated to him, that he intended to adhere to the Barons; but desired first to talk with the King his Father, to persuade him to give them entire Satisfaction: That not being able to execute this Design, by reason of his being thus blocked up, he intreated him to be a Witness of his Conduct. The Bishop being persuaded of the Prince's Sincerity, told the Citizens of Bristol, it would be for the good of the Common Cause to let Edward go; to which they consented, and the Blockade was raised. Accordingly the Prince set out, in Company with the Bishop, who did not question but this Journey would prove successful. But when they came near Windsor, Edward clapping Spurs to his Horse, rid away from the Bishop, without taking leave, and thus himself up in the Castle. However, this Fraud did not turn so much to the Prince's Advantage, as he expected. The Bishop, provoked at this Deceit, carried his Complaints to the Barons, who immediately resolved to lay Siege to Windsor. This Castle was so ill provided with every thing necessary for a good Defence, that Edward thought it not in his Power to stand a Siege. But on the other hand, he could not resolve to lose the Place. As he depended very much upon his Address, he imagined, it would not be impossible to amuse the Barons by a Negotiation, which would leave him in possession of the Castle upon certain Terms, the Performance whereof would be in his Power. For that purpose, he went himself to the Earl of Leicester, who was advancing towards Windsor. He met the General at Kingston upon Thames, where he held a Conference with him. But, just as he was preparing to return, without coming to any Agreement, he was seized (1), and by that means forced to accept of what Terms were imposed on him. He was required, to surrender the Castle of Windsor to the Barons, and to order the Garrison, consisting wholly of Foreigners, to depart the Kingdom.

The War seemed to be going to rekindle with greater Fury than ever, so much did the two Parties appear exasperated against one another. Nevertheless, as the King was not ready, and it was the Barons Interest to let him begin the Hostilities, in order to gain the People to their Side, some peaceable Persons, took the Opportunity to mediate a Truce, which was followed by a Peace on the same Conditions with the former (2). But this Treaty restored not Tranquillity to the Kingdom. As the King was forced to it, he soon broke it, by endeavouring to surprize Dover Castle, then in the Hands of the Barons. This Attempt obliging both Parties to take Arms again, every one tried to strengthen his Party, by seizing several Places. The Londoners, though inclined to the Barons, were however obliged to keep a sort of Neutrality, having experienced how liable they were to be annoyed by the Garrison of the Tower, which was ever in the King's Hands. Besides Henry had still in the City, a good number of Adherents, who were a Check upon the opposite Party. Mean time, the Earl of Leicester, considering of what Importance it would be, to have the Meropolis on his Side, marched towards it through the County of Surrey, situated South of the Thames; in hopes that his Friends (3), would be able to open to him the Gates of the Bridge. But the King having notice of this Design, left the Tower, and encamped with his Troops about Southwark, with intent to oppose the Enemies Passage. The Earl of Leicester, who relied more on the Assistance of the Citizens, than on his own Forces, vigorously attacked the King's Troops, in expectation that the Londoners would favour his Entrance. During the Fight, some Citizens of the King's Party, perceiving the City was in motion to assist the Earl, locked up the Bridge Gates, and threw the Keys into the River (4). This Contrivance had like to prove fatal to the Earl of Leicester, who for some time was in great disorder, having brought with him but few Soldiers, for fear his Design should be discovered. But at length the Gates being broke open, and the Citizens falling out in Multitudes to his Assistance, the King was forced to retire, and the Earl entered the City.

The Advantage gained by the Barons was attended with the usual Effect, that is, the King made them Proposals of an Agreement. But as all the Treaties hitherto concluded, were fruitless, because the King complained of being forced to accept of too rigorous Terms, which the Barons would never grant; it was agreed on both Sides, to refer all their Differences to the Arbitration of the King of France, Lewis accepting the Mediation, Henry, attended by Prince Edward, met him at Amiens (5), where the States-General were assembled. The Sentence pronounced by Lewis, upon those Differences, was favorable to Henry. He declared the Provisions of Oxford to be null, and void; restored the King to his ancient Power; adjudged that he might nominate all the great Officers of the Crown; and that Foreigners were as capable of Offices and Dignities, as the English themselves. But he added one Clause, which destroyed the whole, by declaring, it was not his Intent to abrogate the Privileges granted to the English, by their Kings, before the Parliament of Oxford (6). The Barons looked upon this Clause, as a manifest Contradiction, because they pretended, the Provisions of Oxford, were enacted only to corroborate their Privileges. This furnished them with a Pretence to reject the Award, and renew the War (7).

The Account of what passed between the two Parties, till the famous Battle of Lewes, is clogged with so many confused Circumstances, for such as know not the Situation of the Places, where the War was waged, that it must be very tedious. It is better to hasten to that remarkable Event, which put an end to the Quarrel, in favour of the Barons. I shall only observe, that during the Interval between the renewal of the War, and that Battle, Henry gained several Advantages over the Barons; and also by means of the Prince his Son, and the King of the Romans, gained several of them, who considerably strengthened his Party. Moreover he became master of Oxford, from whence he expelled the Scholars, for showing to much Partiality to the Barons. The Town of Northampton was taken by Storm by the King's Troops, where fifteen Barons, and sixty Knights, were made Prisoners (8). The King was like to have hanged them all; but the Advice of his Generals, and the fear of Reprisals, diverted him from proceeding, to that Extremity. The taking of Northampton, was followed by that of Nottingham. Then the King marched into Kent, where he obliged the Barons to raise the Siege of Rochester, and retire to London.

The King was equally susceptible of Presumption and Fear, according to the Posture of his Affairs. Flushed with the Success, his Arms had hitherto been crowned with, he resolved to march directly to London. He did not question but the City, discouraged by his late Advantages, would declare in his favour. Perhaps his hopes would not have been groundless, if, since his being on the Throne, he had treated the Citizens more civilly. But the Remembrance of their Ill-Usage, prevented them from exposing themselves to the like Danger. The Earl of Leicester taking occasion from the King's Approach to exasperate them against him; managed so dextrously, that he persuaded them to go out of the City, and offer him Battle. Henry was surprized at this, and being unwilling to hazard a Battle with them at their own Gates, retired farther off, and encamped at Lewes in the County of Sussex.

Mean time, the Earl of Leicester, with the confederate Barons, reinforcing their Army with a strong Body of Londoners (1), marched out of the City in pursuit of the King, with Intent to decide the Quarrel by a Battle. Pursuant to this Resolution, they advanced towards Lewes, and encamped about six Miles from the King's Army (2). This they did, to try whether there might be still some means to restore Peace to the Kingdom. It may be, they really wished it, or else it was only to clear themselves from the Blame, of what should follow upon the King's Refusal to accept of reasonable Terms. Before they approached any nearer, they sent the King Word (3), that they had taken Arms; not to withdraw their Allegiance, but only to reform what was amiss in the Government; that they humbly besought him to join with them in that Work, protesting he should find them as faithful as those, who under colour of serving him, sought only his Ruin, by endeavouring to set him against his most dutiful Subjects, by their inhuman Calumnies. How respectful soever this Letter might be, it touched those about the King too sensibly, to be received with Moderation. The King of the Romans and Prince Edward were so offended at it, that they answered it with the Lie, Defiance, and Threats, and prevailed with the King to send the like Answer (4). If it be true, as it is not unlikely, that the Barons made this Step only to clear themselves from Blame, they were glad of so plausible a Pretence, to push things to Extremity. Accordingly, without farther Ceremony, they sent the King Word, that they renounced the Fealty they owed him, and considered him no more, but as an Enemy to the State (5).

All hopes of Agreement being lost, by the Animosity of both Parties, nothing was thought of but a Battle. The Earl of Leicester, advancing with his Army, drew it up in order of Battle, near the King's, who was preparing to receive him. The Royal Army was divided into three Bodies, of which that on the Right, was commanded by Prince Edward (6), the King of the Romans was on the Left (7), and Henry himself headed the main Body. The Barons Army was divided into four Bodies. The first was led by Henry de Montfort the General's Son (8). The Earl of Gloucester (9) commanded the second. The third was headed by the Earl of Leicester. The fourth wholly consisting of Londoners, was on the Left, commanded by Nicolas Segraue. The two Armies being thus drawn up, Prince Edward began the Fight with attacking the Londoners, who not being able to stand so vigorous a Charge, immediately took to their Heels. As the Prince was animated with a desire, of revenging the Affront done the Queen his Mother by the London Mob, he pursued them above four Miles, without giving them any Quarter. But this Revenge cost him dear. Whilst he pursued his Victory, with more eagerness than discretion, the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester gained the same Advantage over Henry, and the King of the Romans. The Barons being very sensible, what their Lot would be, in case they were vanquished, attacked with a Fury mixt with Despair, the Royal Troops, who had not the same reason to fight with that Animosity. Accordingly they took to flight, after a faint Resistance, leaving the two Kings in the hands of their Enemies. Henry surrendering himself to the Earl of Leicester, and Richard to the Earl of Gloucester, were presently conducted to the Priory of Lewes, situated at the Foot of the Castle, which was kept by some of the King's Troops. To this Place the Soldiers of the Royal Army fled, in order to retire into the Castle. But when they saw the Town in the Power of the Barons, the two Kings made Prisoners, and in all appearance, themselves going to be fur-rounded on all Sides, they threw down their Arms, and surrendered at Discretion (10).

Mean time, Prince Edward, who was returning in Triumph from the Pursuit of the Londoners, was extremely surprized to see the Royal Army dispersed, and to hear, the two Kings were Prisoners. His first Thoughts were, to exert his utmost to set them at Liberty. It is probable this Resolution could have been immediately executed, it would have infallibly changed the Face of Affairs. The Conquerors, employed in guarding their Prisoners, or dispersed about the Field in pursuit of the flying Enemies, would have found it difficult to withstand a vigorous Attack. But the Prince's Soldiers, dismayed at the Defeat of the rest of the Army, and the Captivity of the two Kings, showed no Inclination to renew a Fight which to them seemed too unequal. This Fear, which all Edward's Solicitations could not overcome, made him lose so fair an opportunity, wherein, very probably, he would have gained great Reputation. Mean time, the Earl of Leicester drew his Army together again, with all possible Expedition. At first, he thought only of defending himself, justly dreading to be attacked in his present Disorder. But when he saw he had time to rally his Troops, his only Concern was, to hinder the Prince from escaping. To that end, he sent him Proposals, to amuse him, whilst by several Detachments he took care to prevent his Retreat.

Edward's uncertainty at first what Course he should take, the Opposition of his own Troops, the time spent in trying to animate them, and the several Messages from the Earl of Leicester to amuse him, were the Cause of his losing so many precious Hours, which should have been employed, either in fighting, or retreating in good order. But having done neither, he found himself on a sudden surrounded on all Sides, and under a Necessity of accepting Conditions, which appeared tolerable in his ill Situation. This Negotiation, which lasted but a few Moments, was ended by these Articles: That the Statutes of Oxford should be inviolably observed; yet so, that they might be amended by four Bishops or Barons chosen by the Parliament: And if these four Commissioners should not agree, they were to stand to the Arbitration of the Earl of Anjou, Brother to the King of France, assisted by four French Noblemen. Thus far, all went well for the Prince; but the last Article was the worst, namely, That himself and Henry his Cousin, Son to the King of the Romans, should remain as Hostages in the Custody of the Barons, till all things were settled by Authority of Parliament. How hard soever this Article was, Edward, who saw no remedy, was forced to consent to it. These Articles, called the Mise, that is to say, the Agreement of Lewes, were signed by Edward, and confirmed by the King, who was not in condition to reject them.

The Earl of Leicester having the King and almost all the Royal Family in his Power, took all the Advantages that his Policy could suggest to him. He, who a little before scrupled not to disobey the King, because he was directed by evil Counsellors, now only used that Monarch's Name. He made him send Orders to the Governors of his Castles to surrender them to the Barons. He caused him to sign Commissions to the Sheriff of the several Counties, empowering them to take up Arms against all that should dare to disturb the State, that is, against the King's own Friends. In short, he who had been so troublesome to the King, on purpose to curb the exorbitant Power he would have assumed, took it very ill that this same King, when guided wholly by his Counsels, was not implicitly obeyed. Thus it is that Men alter their Principles and Maxims according to their Interests, and as their Affairs come to have a new Face. But these are Reflections that would too frequently occur, should we stay to make them every time there was occasion.

As the Barons had no other View in the Agreement of Lewes, but to secure the Person of Prince Edward, they were not very forward to perform it. On the contrary, they drew up a new Plan of Government, and resolved to have it confirmed by the Parliament which was to meet in the 22d of June. The Posture of the Affairs of the Kingdom rendered the Calling of this Parliament liable to many Difficulties. Indeed it was done in the King's Name, who could not oppose it. But the victorious Barons, were not willing, those of the contrary Party should be summoned, under Pretence, they were still in Arms against their Country. On the other hand, a Parliament consisting only of Part of those who had a Right to sit there, seemed to want a lawful Authority. It might be objected, that it was only an Assembly of private Persons. These Difficulties put the Barons upon contriving how to make this Assembly more general, and give it a greater Air of Authority. To this end, they made the King sign Commissions, appointing in each County certain Officers or Magistrates called Conservators, on pretence they were designed for preserving the Privileges of the People. These Officers, who depended wholly on the Barons, were invested with very great Authority. Their Commission empowered them to do whatever they should judge proper, to preserve entire the Rights and Liberties of the Subjects. This Step being taken, the King was made to sign new Orders to the Conservators, to send up (1) four Knights of each County to sit in the ensuing Parliament, as Representatives of their respective Shires. From hence many affirm, the Original of the Right of the Commons to sit in Parliament takes its Date. They maintain, this is the first time, that the several Counties undeniably appear to send Representatives to the Parliament: That all the Reasons alleged to prove, the Commons enjoyed this Privilege before the Year 1264, are subject to so many Difficulties, that they can't be said to amount to a clear Proof. It seems indeed, that a good Reason can't be produced, why the Historians should unanimously take notice, that on this occasion there were in the Parliament Representatives of each County, if the same thing had been customary from the beginning of the Monarchy, or at least from the Norman Conquest. Why did they neglect to make the same Remark on so many former Parliaments mentioned by them? It is certain, those, who pretend to find in the ancient Historians Proofs of the People sending Representatives to Parliament, are forced to deduce them from Consequences which appear not always just (2).

The new Parliament composed in the manner above-mentioned, being entirely at the Devotion of the confederate Barons, failed not to approve of the projected Form of Government, namely, That the Parliament should appoint three wise and discreet Commissioners, who should have Power to chuse a Council of nine Lords, to whom the Administration of the Publick Affairs should be committed. That the King by the Advice of the Commissioners, might change when he pleased, some, or all of the nine Counsellors. That in case the three Commissioners should not agree in changing or choosing the Counsellors, the Majority should decide it. That the Resolutions taken by the nine Counsellors should be in Force, provided they were approved by any six of them. But if it happened, that six of them should not agree, the Business in Question should be brought to the three Commissioners, who should determine it as they thought fit. That the King might change or turn out the three Commissioners, provided it was with the Consent of the Community of the Barons. Lastly, that the Nomination of all the publick Officers should belong to the nine Counsellors. This Ordinance was to take place till the Parliament should unanimously agree to annul or alter it. It is pretended, the King and Prince Edward were compelled to consent to it, the first by being threatened with Deprivation, and the other with perpetual Imprisonment. So that, if they outwardly consented, it was only with a Resolution to recant the first Opportunity. Mean time the Barons continued to govern the Kingdom according to this Model, imagining their Affairs to be so firmly settled, as not to be easily shaken.

The last Year, Urban IV appointed for his Legate in England Cardinal Guido Bishop of St. Sabine. This Legate at his Arrival in France received a Letter from the Earl of Leicester, informing him, it was no proper time for this Legation, and that neither the Nobles nor the People were disposed to receive him. Though the Legate was extremely offended at this Refusal, he durst not however continue his Journey. Indeed, there was no likelihood of his entering the Kingdom against the Consent of those who governed. Nevertheless he proceeded as far as Boulogne, where he summoned all the English Bishops to appear, and give an Account of their Conduct. The Bishops not thinking fit to obey the Summons, he denounced against them the Sentence of Excommunication, from which they appealed to the Pope. At length the Affairs of the Kingdom being settled according to the Barons Desire, they thought it necessary to give the Legate some Satisfaction. To that end, they sent four Bishops (3) to acquaint him with their Reasons for denying him Entrance into the Kingdom. These Envoys found the Legate extremely incensed against the Barons. For Answer, they had Orders to return into England, publish the Sentence of Excommunication against the Earl of Leicester, and put the City of London with all the Earl of Gloucester's Lands under an Interdict. The Bishops sending word to England of the Orders received from the Legate, were met at Sea by People (4), who pretending to be Pirates, took away all their Papers, and threw them overboard. This Proceeding convincing the Legate, it would be difficult to cause his Master's Authority to be regarded at such a Juncture, he returned to Rome, where quickly after he was raised to the Papal Throne under the Name of Clement IV.

Mean time, the Earl of Leicester, who was at the head of the Government, was under some Trouble. The Queen was making great Preparations in France to deliver the King her Spouse. On the other hand, the Insurrection of some Lords (5), bordering upon Wales, made him uneasy. He was apprehensive that the Welsh would intermeddle in the Quarrel, and assist the King's Party. It was dangerous to leave the Coasts open to the Invasion of the Foreigners, who, being then in Flanders, waited only for a fair Wind to embark. But it was no less inconvenient, to suffer the Insurrection, which began to appear in the Marches of Wales, to grow to a head. To prevent these Dangers, he resolved to go in Person against the Rebels, whilst he ordered the Militia of the Kingdom to assemble in Kent, and oppose the Queen's Landing. His good Fortune equally freed him from both these Perils. Having gained to his Interests Lewelyn Prince of Wales, who might have given him some Trouble, he vanquished the Rebels, and compelled them to throw down their Arms. He was no less fortunate with regard to the dreaded Invasion. The contrary Winds held so long, that the foreign Troops on the other Side of the Water, were forced to return home, upon the Approach of Winter, without the Queen's reaping the least Benefit from the great Expences she had been at (6). All this while the King remained in the Custody of the Earl of Leicester, who disposed of him just as he pleased, making him act against his own Interests, under Colour that it was for the Good of the Publick.

The Barons, who had taken up Arms against the King, purely on account of the exorbitant Power, he would have assumed, could not but be jealous of the Earl of Leicester's, which was no less absolute. The Earl of Gloucester (7), above all the rest, was highly displeased (8). He looked upon Leicester as a Man taking large steps towards the Throne, under the specious pretence of the Publick Good. For this reason he was afraid, in promoting his Advancement, of furnishing him with Arms to his own, as well as to the destruction of others, who were no less jealous of his Greatness. The Disgrace of [Robert de Ferrars] Earl of Derby, gave him cause to make these Reflections. This Earl, who was no Friend to Leicester, was sent to the Tower, not so much for a punishment of the Crime laid to his charge, as for an Example to such, as should dare to censure too openly the Conduct of the principal Governor. On the other hand, the Earl of Gloucester fancied he saw, in the cold and reserved Behaviour of Leicester towards him, a secret purpose to destroy him when an opportunity should offer. He was not only no longer called to the private Councils, but also had no farther share in the Affairs, than what could not be denied to one of the greatest Peers of the Realm. These Reasons, and more than all this, his Envy at Leicester's Greatness, led him to countenance the Male-contents in the Marches of Wales, in order to employ them in opposing the ambitious designs, of him whom he now considered as an Enemy. The Cabals, he openly made, convincing Leicester, that he ought to omit nothing to destroy the Designs of so dangerous an Enemy, he caused an Order to be sent to all that had lately taken up Arms against the Establishment, to retire into Ireland. But they, instead of obeying, withdrew upon the Lands of the Earl of Gloucester, where they met with Protection.

So true an Englishman was this Author, though he appears highly concerned for the King's Interest, that he did not think it safe for the Nation to have had the King restored by an Army of Foreigners, p. 388.

Mean time, the Earl of Leicester's Enemies published in all places, that his rigorous Treatment of the King, and also of the King of the Romans and Prince Edward, was but too evident a Proof of his pernicious Designs. As these Reports began to be prejudicial to the Earl, he thought it necessary to efface these Impressions, by letting the People see, he was very far from forming the ambitious Projects ascrib'd to him by his Enemies. To that purpose, he summoned a Parliament (1) declaring, it was to consider of means to restore Prince Edward to Liberty. He intended by that to show, that since he was willing to release the Heir to the Crown, it was very unlikely he should have those pernicious Views he was charged with.

The calling of this Parliament was remarkable, for that each County, was ordered to send, as their Representatives, two Knights, and each City and Borough, as many Citizens and Burgesses (2). The Assertors of the Antiquity of the House of Commons infer from hence, that since the Historians observe not that it was a new Institution, it was therefore a customary thing. Others, on the contrary, pretend, if it had been usual, it would have been needless to take notice of this Circumstance after mention of so many Parliaments, without the like Remark. The Reader will choose of these two Consequences that which to him seems most natural.

When the Parliament met, the Earl of Leicester, who dispos'd in great measure of the Votes, caus'd an Order to be pass'd for the release of Prince Edward. But it was clos'd with a Condition that rendered the Favour of no use, namely, that he should remain with the King his Father, and obey him in all things. This Condition was a plain Sign, it was only intended to dazzle the Eyes of the Publick. And indeed, to ordain that Edward should be set at liberty, and yet continue with his Father, who was himself a Prisoner, was no better than changing or at most enlarging his Prison. Pursuant to this Order, the Prince was taken out of Dover Castle, where he had been confin'd ever since the Battle of Lewes, and deliver'd to the King, that is, to the Earl of Leicester. This is what was call'd giving him his Liberty. In the mean time Henry continued in the Custody of Leicester, who carried him about with him, and took all imaginable care to prevent his Prisoners from escaping.

The late Scene, serv'd only to increase the Earl of Gloucester's Suspensions, or rather fully to convince him that Leicester was paving his way to the Throne. He would not however have broke yet, if an Opportunity had not offer'd, where it would have been dangerous to dissemble. The two eldest Sons of the Earl of Leicester proclaiming a Tournament for all the young Nobles, the Earl of Gloucester did not think fit to be present. He believed, this was only a Device to draw him into some Snare. Whether his Suspensions had any Foundation, or his Prejudice made him consider them as plain Proofs, he openly confederated with the Lords of the Marches of Wales, Enemies to Leicester, and fortified his Castles, as preparing for War.

This Proceeding furnishing his Enemies with a plausible Pretence to fall upon him, a Proclamation was issued forthwith, declaring the Earl and his Adherents Traytors and Enemies to the State. Pursuant to this Declaration, Leicester put himself at the Head of an Army, in order to punish these pretended Enemies of the King. With this Design he march'd towards the Severn, and afterwards came to Hereford, carrying his two Prisoners along with him.

His great care to secure the King and the Prince his Son, did not hinder the Earl of Gloucester from projecting Edward's Escape. He perceived as long as his Enemy had the King in his Power, he would make great advantage thereof. For which Reason he thought it expedient to get the Prince out of his hands, to oppose the Authority of the lawful Heir to the Crown, to That of the captive King. Probably, he did not judge it so easy to free the King as the Prince, or perhaps depended more upon the Assistance of Edward than of the King his Father. Be this as it will, he communicated his Design to Roger Mortimer, one of the Lords Marches, who furnished him with means to put it in execution. Mortimer having many Friends at Hereford, made Edward a Present, by a Third Hand of a very swift Horse, and withal acquainted him with the use he was to make of it, and the Design laid for the recovery of his Liberty. To second the Project, the Prince signing himself ill, and to want Exercise, desir'd leave to ride some Horses. The Earl of Leicester, who suspected nothing of the Matter, granted his Request, though with great Precaution. Besides his usual Guard, he order'd some Gentlemen to keep always near him, and to have their Eye upon him continually. Edward being come into the Fields, immediately breath'd two or three Horses. Then he call'd for that lately presented him, and as if he had a mind to use him gently to his Rider, walk'd him at some distance from his Guard, being accompanied by the Gentlemen who kept close to him. When he was come to a certain place which he had before carefully remark'd, and which seem'd proper for his Design, laying the Reins on his Horse's Neck, and clapping Spurs to his Sides, he so surpris'd those that attend'd him, that he was at a good distance before they were recovered from their Astonishment. However they rid after him till they saw a Troop of Horses, sent by the Earl of Gloucester to favour his escape. Edward being thus freed, went and join'd the Earl of Gloucester, who receiv'd him with great Joy and Respect. Nevertheless, his View in procuring the Prince his Liberty, was not to re-establish the Arbitrary Power usurp'd by the King. Accordingly he plainly told Edward, he could not promise his Assistance, unless he would oblige himself by Oath, to use his utmost Endeavours to restore the ancient Laws, and to banish all Foreigners from about the King's Person. Edward promis'd and swore it, in the presence of several Barons, and then took the Command of the Troops rais'd by the Earl of Gloucester.

Though the Earl of Leicester was very sensible of what Consequence the Prince's Escape might be, he pretended to be unconcern'd at it, and continued, as before, to govern in the King's Name. He issu'd under the Great Seal, all such Orders as he judg'd expedient for the Good of the State and his own Interest, these two things being generally confounded, by those who hold the Reins of the Government.

It would be needless to relate here all Leicester's Precautions, to support himself in his Authority, to enrich his Friends, and to advance his Creatures. It suffices to say in a word, that he omitted nothing that might turn to his Advantage, or contribute to the baffling the Designs of his Enemies (3). All this was for his own sake, and with a View to his own Interest: But he did one thing very beneficial to the Kingdom in taking at length from the Popes, the Pretence, so long and so successfully used by them, to enrich themselves at the Expence of the English. As he found the People had not for the Pope the same Esteem and Deference as formerly, he order'd a Commission to be drawn up, empowering him to renounce in the King and Prince Edmund's Name, all Pretensions to the Crown of Sicily. By virtue of this Power, he made an Authentick Renunciation, of which he took care to give the Pope Notice in a Letter from the King.

Mean time the Earl, foreseeing how fatal Prince Edward's Escape might prove to him, caus'd very severe Orders to be published to all the King's Subjects, to oppose to the utmost of their Power, Prince Edward, the 1265. Earl of Gloucester, and their Adherents, who were all flitted Traytors to the King and State. But notwithstanding this, many Barons, Officers and Soldiers, came and offered their Service to the Prince, who, in a short time, saw himself at the Head of an Army, superior to that of the Confederates. Then it was that Affairs began to have a new Face. The Earl of Leicester, who, a little before, had all the Forces of the Kingdom at his Disposal, could not prevent Edward from becoming master of Gloucester and several other Places. He was even forced to give ground to that young Prince, who followed him from Place to Place, and to use all his Policy and Experience to avoid a Battle. As he was a very good General, he took timely Care to post himself so, as to be able to retreat, whenever he should be pressed. Mean while, he sent repeated Orders to his Son Simon, to quit the Siege of Pevensey, which detained him in Kent, and come and reinforce him. Simon obeyed, and with his little Army began to march with extraordinary Expedition, to join him. But as he drew near Evesham, where his Father was encamped, Edward having notice of his coming, suddenly fell upon him with all his Forces, and cut in pieces this little Body, which could not resist him (2).

This Victory animating the young Prince with fresh Ardour, he immediately returned to attack the Father, before he had received the News of his Son's Defeat. He so deceived the Watchfulness of the old General, by this sudden Resolution, that he was very near the Enemies when the Earl imagined it was his Son coming to his Assistance. Leicester's Surprise was so great, that he could not help showing it. However he put every thing in a good Posture of Defence, perceiving that a Retreat would be still more dangerous than a Battle. The Fight began about two in the Afternoon, and lasted till Night, notwithstanding the hasty Flight of the Welsh Men, who deserted the Earl at the very first Onset. He sustained however, by his Courage and Conduct, the Efforts of Edward, who fought with an astonishing Valour, well knowing that the good or ill-Fortune of his Life depended on the Success of that Day. At length, after a long Resistance on the Side of the Barons, the Earl of Leicester and his Son Henry being slain on the Spot, their Troops were disheartened, and the Prince obtained a full and complete Victory (3). His Joy at this Success was the greater, as, during the Heat of the Battle, he had the Satisfaction to deliver the King his Father, from the Captivity he had been in ever since the Battle of Lewes. The Earl of Leicester, who durst not suffer his Prisoner out of his sight, had been so cruel, as to expose him to the Danger of the Battle, in which, he was wounded in the Shoulder.

Nay, it is said he was like to be killed by a Soldier, who knew him not, if an Officer had not run to his Assistance, upon his crying to the Soldier, Don't kill me, I am Henry of Winchester, thy Sovereign. Edward, who was not far from the Place, being informed of his Father's Peril, ran thither immediately. He left him to a strong Guard, and just asking his Blessing, returned to the Battle, that he might not lose so precious a time.

This Battle was fought near Evesham on the 4th of August 1265, fourteen Months after the Battle of Lewes, wherein the King lost his Liberty. The Body of the Earl of Leicester being found among the dead, Roger Mortimer was so inhuman as to mangle it in a barbarous manner. At last he cut off the Head and sent it to his Wife, as a certain Token of his being revenged of his Enemy (4). Such was the end of Leicester, who, though a Foreigner, found means to make himself the most considerable Peer in the Kingdom, and was even suspected of aspiring to the Throne. But of this however there is no certain proof, the Reports that were spread being built only on bare Suspicions, and, perhaps, Calumnies. But it can't be denied, that he abused his Power, and the Confidence of his Friends and Colleagues. At least he discovered by his Conduct, that he was not so great an Enemy to arbitrary Power, as he pretended, when placed at the Head of the Confederates. This is no proof however of his aspiring to the Crown. Certainly, this Earl had noble Qualities. If he was like the Earl his Father in his Valour and Bravery, at least he resembled him not in his Cruelty. He always expected to great a regard for the Monks, that after his Death, they would have tainted him, at any Rate, pretending that many Murders were wrought at his Tomb. A modern Historian assures us, he saw in an ancient Manuscript several Prayers directed to him as a Martyr (5). This Opinion was so spread among the People, that the Pope was forced to use all his Authority to put a Stop to that Superstition. However this be, as we are uncertain of the Motive of the Earl's Actions, we are no less so, whether he was more worthy of Blame than of Pity. If in taking up Arms against the King, his Sovereign and Benefactor, he was entirely swayed by Ambition, one can't sufficiently deride his Ingratitude to a Prince his Brother-in-law, who had loaded him with Favours. But if he was head of a Party solely with a View to the Good of the Publick, and to free the Kingdom from the manifest Oppression it groaned under, doubtless there would be People who would not want plausible Reasons to justify his Conduct. Mean while, without examining this Motive too closely, modern Writers, for the most part inveigh bitterly against him, and the English Cathline is one of the best Names they afford him. But this is no more than what we are to expect from most Historians, who generally dedicate their Works to King, Queens, Prime-Ministers, Favorites.

The Defeat of the Confederates entirely changed the Face of Affairs. Those who a little before were persecuted, became Persecutors in their turn. They plagued their Enemies a thousand Ways, and made them endure many Hardships. The King, who was naturally revengeful and greedy of Money, was extremely impatient to be revenged of those who had offended him, and to seize their Spoils. To that end he called a Parliament (6), which wholly consisting of his Creatures, granted him the Confiscation of the Estates of the Rebels (7). The City of London was not spared. The Parliament having decreed that she deserved to forfeit all her Privileges, she was left to the King's Mercy, who took away her Gates, Chains, Magistrate, and exacted a large Sum of Money (8) from the Citizens, to restore again what he had taken from them. The Confederate Barons feeling themselves exposed to a Revenge, which probably would have no Bounds, were in the greater Contemnation, as they saw no Remedy in this their Distress. Simon de Montfort, eldest Son of the Earl of Leicester, did not question but he should be attacked one of the first, considering the King's Hatred to the Earl his Father and his whole Family. In this Belief, he endeavoured to make himself Richard King of the Romans his Friend, whom he had in Custody in Kenilworth Castle, by releasing him (9) without demanding a Ransom. This Example turned to the Advantage of several Prisoners of the Battle of Lewes, who were likewise set at Liberty with the same View by their Keepers (10).

Mean time, the King was revenging himself on those that had taken Arms against him, by seizing their Estates, which he kept to his own Use, or bestowed them liberally on his Favorites. Instead of troubling himself about the Consequences, he entirely gave way to his Passion, without considering, that People reduced to Beggary are not 1266. 1. from Despair. He would have done much better in imitating the prudent Conduct of the Earl of Pembroke his nob. Governour, who retired to the vanquished Barons their Estates, for fear of exposing the Kingdom to fresh Troubles. But Henry was not of that Character. It was not his Fault that he lost not the Fruits of the Prince his Son's Victory over the Barons, by refusing them the least Pardon. Simon de Montfort, perceiving his Case desperate, left the Castle of Kenilworth, with a strong Garrison, and assembling some of the Remains of his Father's Army, threw himself into the Isle of Asholme in Lincolnshire (1). As it was very easy to fortify that Place, he soon put it in condition to serve for refuge to himself and Friends. Great Numbers resorted to him daily, who at length began to make their Enemies uneasy.

1266. Whilst the Court was preparing to hinder the Consequences of this new Revolt, the Queen arrived from France (2), where she had retired with Prince Edmund her Son, after the Battle of Lewes. She was quickly followed by a Legate (3), who, a few Days after his Coming, convened a Synod, and solemnly excommunicated the late Earl of Gloucester and all his Adherents, as well dead as alive (4). Clement IV, finding the English tired with supplying Money for the Conquest of Sicily, thought it convenient to save the Honour of the Holy See, which had somewhat suffered by Prince Edmund's Renunciation. For that purpose he gave the King notice by his Legate, of a Bull of Urban his Predecessor, revoking the Grant to the Prince his Son. He had kept this Bull private, because he was willing to see the Issue of a Negotiation with Charles Earl of Anjou, to whom he actually gave this very Year the Investiture of the two Sicilies. Henry, who had quitted his Pretensions, only as forced to it by the Earl of Gloucester during his Captivity, could not without regret see himself obliged to renounce his Hopes. But he could not help it.

Thus ended at length the Affair of Sicily, which had been to the Popes a fertile Source of Oppressions upon the People and Clergy of England. If it cost the English immense Sums, they reaped at least this Benefit by it, that it sensibly lessened their former good Opinion of every thing that flowed from the Court of Rome, and taught them to be more upon their Guard for the future against her Usurpations. This is what we shall have occasion to know more particularly in the following Reigns, where we shall see the English much less tractable with regard to the Popes. It may be said further, that this Affair was the principal Cause of the Misfortunes to which Henry was exposed for so many Years, and withal, of the solid Establishment of the Great Charter, which from thenceforward was but feebly attacked. Had not Henry been under a Necessity of satisfying the Avarice of the Popes, he would have less oppressed his Subjects, and the Barons would have wanted the most plausible Pretence of their Confederacy. It is very strange, the Pope's Grant to Prince Edmund should be unknown to the Historians of Naples and Sicily, who mention it not, though the Countries of which they have written the History were so much concerned. There is but one that just speaks of it, and even he is mistaken in the Name of the English Prince, to whom he says the Pope would have given Sicily. Villani, an Historian of Note, recites the Pope's Speech to the Cardinals, to induce them to approve of his design to invest Charles of Anjou with the two Sicilies. In this Harangue, the Pontiff represents to them, all the Injuries sustained by the Church from Manfred, the Necessity of destroying the House of Swabia, and the Advantages which would accrue to the Church, if these Kingdoms were given to a Prince who was able to undertake her Defence. One would think, this was a very natural occasion, to mention the Endeavours of his Predecessors to dethrone the Usurper, by the King of England's Assistance, in giving the Crown of these Kingdoms to one of his Sons. But he says not a word of the Matter. What may then be inferred from this Silence of the Pope, and the Neapolitan and Sicilian Historians, but that the Court of Rome never really intended to procure this Crown for Prince Edmund, and that her sole Aim was to drain England of Money, under the Pretence of a Pretence?

As Montfort's Retreat to the Isle of Asholme, might be attended with such Consequences, as required Prevention, Prince Edward was sent with an Army into those Parts. It was no easy Matter to dislodge the Malecontents, from a Place so strongly fortified both by Art and Nature. However, the Prince failed not to accomplish it. After an obstinate Defence, the Besiegers were constrained to surrender (5), on condition their Lives and Limbs were spared. As to their Estates, it was agreed they should submit to the Judgment of the King of the Romans, and Prince Edward. This Capitulation being signed, Montfort was brought to the King (6), and found a powerful Mediator in the King of the Romans. This Prince affirmed, that after the Battle of Evesham, the Garrison of Kenilworth would have murdered him, if Montfort had not hindered it at the Peril of his own Life. Then he entreated the King to pardon him, in consideration of his having generously released him, without demanding a Ransom. It is said, Henry, moved with Montfort's good Offices to the King his Brother, was inclined to restore him entirely to Favour, if the Earl of Gloucester had not openly opposed it. So that, as it was necessary to keep fair with Gloucester, as well as with the King of the Romans, it was resolved in Council, that Montfort should have Liberty to depart the Kingdom (7), and the King should grant him a yearly Pension of five hundred Marks (8), provided he delivered up Kenilworth-Castle. But it was not in his Power to perform this Condition, because the Garrison refused to obey him. All the other Rebels in Asholme were pardoned, upon their swearing, never more to bear Arms against the King. An Oath which was afterwards very ill kept. This Affair being over, the Kingdom immediately enjoyed some Tranquillity. Montfort seemed pretty well satisfied with his Lot. But shortly after, whether out of Inconstancy, or because he had not wherewithal to subsist, he joined himself with certain Pyrates of the Cinque Ports, who gave him the Command of their Ships, with which he plundered without Distinction, all the Merchant-Men that came in his way. As it plainly appeared, that the Inhabitants of the Cinque Ports countenanced these Pyrates, the King sent Prince Edward to chastise them (9). But the Prince found means to reduce them to their Duty, without using Force (10), namely, by promising them a general Pardon, and the Confirmation of their Privileges, for which they renewed their Fealty to the King.

How successful the King's Arms might be, it could not be said, that Peace was fully restored to the Kingdom, since Kenilworth-Castle was still in the Hands of the Malecontents. There was likewise, in the northern Counties, a Troop of armed Men (11), who obliged the King to send against them Henry, eldest Son of the King of the Romans. This young Prince made such speed, that he surprized the Rebels, and killing the greatest part, dispersed the rest. He could not however seize the Ring-leaders (12), who joining with other Malecontents, and particularly those of Asholme, became Masters of the Isle of Ely in Cambridgehire. From thence they made continual Inroads into the neighbouring Counties, committing great Ravages.

At the same time, another Rebel, Adam [de Gurdun], taking up Arms in Hampshire, Edward marched into those parts, where he had occasion to give sensible proofs of his Courage and Generosity. In a Battle with the Rebels, Adam, who was strong and valiant, attacked the Prince Hand to Hand, and obliged him to use all his Dexterity and Valour. This single Combat was not interrupted, till Adam, being down on the Ground, was forced to yield himself Prisoner to the Prince (13). This Act of Bravery in Edward was immediately followed by another of Generosity, which gained him no less Honour. Without suffering himself to be transported with a desire of Revenge upon a Man who had put him in so great Danger, he generously gave him Life and Li-berly. Adam sensibly touched, as he ought, with this Favour, served him faithfully ever after (1).

The Garrison of Kensworth was become so formidable, and withal so odious, by their Outrages committed in the neighbouring Country, that the King's Council resolved, this Castle should be immediately invested, and the Siege of Ely put off to another time. The King was extremely incoffend by the Governor of Kensworth for insolently cutting off the Hand of his Herald, sent to summon him to surrender. His desire to punish him, made him resolve to go in Person to this Siege, imagining his Presence would strike the greater Terror into the Belieged (2). But they defended themselves so stoutly, that after a six Months Siege, there was no appearance of forcing them to capitulate. This vigorous Resistance was the Reason, that the Siege was turned into a Blockade. Mean time, the King continued in the Town, of which he was Master, expecting that Hunger would compel the Garrison to surrender (3).

During the Blockade, Henry called a Parliament at Kensworth (4), to consider means to reduce the Rebels of Ely, either by offering them an easy Composition, or by Force, in Case they rejected the proffered Favour. To this end the Parliament drew up certain Articles, containing the Terms on which the King was to grant a general Pardon (5). These Terms were very moderate, considering the present Circumstances. To have Possession of their Estates again, some were to pay five Years value, some three; others but one. But whether the Malecontents could not depend upon the King's Word, or thought these Conditions too hard, they refused to accept them. They even took occasion from thence to increase their Outrages, and had the Boldness to make an Excursion as far as Norwich, from whence they carried away above twenty thousand Pounds Sterling (6).

Those of Kensworth, though closely blocked up, and forced to eat their Horses, relying on the Assistance promised by Simon de Montfort, held out so long a Siege with an invincible Resolution. At length, when they could scarce withstand any longer the Hunger by which they were pressed, seeing no likelihood of Assistance, they capitulated (7) to deliver up the Castle, in case they were not relieved within forty Days (8). Mean time, they were to be furnished with Provisions. This Term being expired, they came out of the Castle so pale and meager, that it could not be conceived, that a Garrison in so wretched a Condition should have the Assurance to demand such a Capitulation (9).

The taking of Kensworth, and his hopes of speedily reducing the Rebels of Ely, made the King forget his past Misfortunes (10), as well as the Prince his Son's Engagement for him, with the Earl of Glocester (11). Edward himself, though more particularly concerned, by reason of his Oath, was more intent upon reducing the Malecontents of Ely to the King's Obedience, than upon executing his Promises. The Earl of Glocester observed with extreme Regret, that as the King's Affairs prospered, the Father and Son acted with less Moderation, and were more ready to stretch the Prerogative Royal beyond the Bounds prescribed by the Laws. What he had done for the King and Prince, was not so much to enlarge the Royal Power, as to prevent the Earl of Leicester from paving his way to the Throne. This was very evident from the Oath he required from Prince Edward. The King's Conduct, who was returning to his former Courses, convincing him, that if the Malecontents were once reduced, it would be very difficult to confine the Sovereign within the Bounds of an Authority limited by the Laws, he thought it necessary to oppose his Progress in time. Thus resolved, he retired to his own Estate on the Borders of Wales, where he made a League with Llewellyn, and some neighbouring Barons. After this, he sent word to the Malecontents of Ely, that he would endeavour to relieve them.

It could not be but his Absence and Preparations should give some Umbrage to the Court. Nevertheless, as he concealed his Designs under the pretence of a Quarrel with Mortimer (12), he still left room to doubt of the Motives of his Armament. Mean time, whereas Policy and good Sense required, that the King should try to give some Satisfaction to so considerable a Lord, all his Thoughts were engrossed, about means to reduce the Rebels of Ely; not so much to restore the publick Tranquillity, as out of Impatience to render himself as much or more absolute than ever. He plainly perceived, he could not attain his Ends, whilst a Body of Rebels were in Arms in the midst of his Dominions. Wherefore, he convened a Parliament, to take measures about quelling the Malecontents (13). The Earl of Glocester's Refusal to be present, made the King uneasy, who sent some Lords (14) to admonish him to come and take his Seat. These Lords found the Earl very busy in raising an Army; and as they shewed their Surprise at it, he told them for their Satisfaction, that the Troops were designed against Mortimer's Enemy. Nay, he scrupled not to give a Writing under his own Seal, whereby he engaged never to bear Arms against the King (15). By this means, he removed all Suspensions, that were entertained of him. This Fear being vanished, the King and Parliament thought of nothing more, but how to besiege Ely, the only thing that still gave them any Disturbance. The Resolution that was taken, of vigorously pushing this Siege, furnishing the King with a plausible pretence to demand an Aid, the Parliament granted him a very considerable Supply (16). Although the Legate had not the same Reasons, he pressed the Clergy however, to grant the same Aid to the Pope. This unreasonable Demand extremely provoked the Prelates. They not only refused to comply, but committed to writing the Reasons of their Denial, which were not much for the Honour of the Court of Rome.

As soon as the Parliament broke up, the King took the Field at the Head of his Army. He advanced as far as Cambridge, where he halted to fend and summon the Rebels of Ely, to return to their Duty. But their Answer plainly discovered, they were not easily to be frightened. This Resolution, and the Situation of the Isle of Ely, which had formerly very much embarrassed William the Conqueror, somewhat abated his warlike Ardour, and caused him to wait (17) the coming of the Prince his Son, who was then at York (18).

Whilst the King was at Cambridge, the Earl of Glocester headed the Army, raised on his own Lands, and in Wales. He forthwith marched towards London, and with that Expedition, that he entered the City before they had time to hinder him, and even before they knew whether he acted for, or against the King. It is however probable, the Magistrates and principal Citizens, were not ignorant of his Designs. Be this as it will, the Earl, leaving every one to make his own Conjectures, approached the Tower, the Custody whereof, was by the King, committed to the Legate. He summoned him to

The Legate surprized at this unexpected Summons, made a show of defending himself. But as he wanted Provisions, and the Earl had strictly forbid the sending in any, he was quickly constrained to surrender. As soon as the Earl was Master of the Tower, he was not so careful to conceal his Designs. Besides, as several of the Male-contents (1) daily joined him, it was visible, his Intention was not to act for the King's Interest. At length, he pulled off the Mask, and published a Manifesto, declaring, he had taken up Arms, to obtain reasonable Terms for the Male-contents. Moreover, he complained of the King and Prince, affirming, his Design was to oblige them to the better performance of their Promises. Surprized at this fresh Revolt, Henry first plying Orders to the Prince his Son, to come and join him immediately, being in continual fear of an Attack. He did not think himself in a Condition to come off with Honour in an Affair of this Nature, if forced to a Battle. These Orders meeting the Prince in his return from the North, where he had finished his Affairs, obliged him to march with all possible speed to the King's Relief (2). As soon as they were joined, they advanced together towards London, and encamped at Stratford, within three Miles of the City. The universal Esteem for Edward among the Nobles and People, rather than their Affection for the King, caused in a very short Space, the Army to be considerably increased (3). For this Reason the Earl of Gloucester continued in London, from whence he durst not stir, for fear of engaging at a great Disadvantage (4). He had been in hopes, the whole Kingdom would side with him, and the King be suddenly deserted by his own Troops. But finding he had relied upon uncertain Affiliations, and his Friends began to forsake him, he timely applied himself to the King of the Romans, by whose Intercession (5), he obtained much better Terms than he had reason to expect (6). He was not only forgiven, upon laying down his Arms, but had the Satisfaction also to have the City of London included in his Pardon, which otherwise would doubtless have been severely punished. He would fain have procured the same Favour for the Rebels of Ely; but the King and Prince being inexorable in that respect, he was forced to abandon their Interests.

This Affair being ended more happily than there was room to expect, Edward approached the Isle of Ely (7). As the Male-contents had no prospect of Relief, they chose to surrender (8) before they were reduced to Extremity. The only Condition granted them, was the saving their Lives and Limbs. By this were extinguished the Troubles, that had for five Years tormented the Kingdom.

Henry, having an Army ready, resolved to correct the Insolence of the Prince of Wales, who, during the late Troubles, had all along assisted the Rebels. To this end, he advanced as far as Montgomery, where Llewellyn sent Ambassadors to sue for Peace. His offer to pay the King thirty thousand Marks, and to do him Homage for his Principality, was an inducement to hearken to his Proposals. But, besides what he had offered, he was farther obliged to deliver up certain Castles, convenient for the King (9).

1268. The Peace of the Kingdom being thus restored, the King summoned a Parliament (10), where Ottobon, the Pope's Legate was present. He informed the Assembly that the Pope was resolved to publish a Crusade, in all the Christian States, and took occasion from thence to exhort the English, to contribute their Money and Persons towards this Expedition; the sole end whereof, was the Glory of God and the Good of the Church. The Tranquillity England began to enjoy, caused great Numbers to engage in this Undertaking, especially when they saw Prince Edward, and Henry Son of the King of the Romans, receive the Cross at the Hands of the Legate. The Earls of Warwick and Penbrooke, and above a hundred and twenty Knights, followed the Example of these two Princes, besides an infinite Multitude of Persons of inferior Quality. The Legate having no further Business in England, returned to Rome, and the King of the Romans took his third Journey to Germany.

Whilst the Croisades were preparing for their Voyage, the King assembled a Parliament at Marlborough, where a Body of Statutes were enacted, which make a considerable Figure among the Laws of England (11).

Before we proceed to the Events of the next Year, it will be necessary to take notice of the Death of Pope Clement IV., which was followed by a Vacancy of three Years. It was also this Year that the famous Battle near the Lake of Celano (12), was fought between Charles of Anjou, the new King of Sicily, and Conradin, Son of the Emperor Conrad. Young Conradin having the Misfortune to be vanquished and taken Prisoner, Charles was so cruel as to cause his Head to be struck off (13).

The Crusade was not only published in England, but also in all the Christian States, and particularly in France, where St. Lewis was to be Head of it. The ill Success of his Expedition into Egypt, not being able to cool this Monarch's Zeal, he had never ceased, since his return, to think of means, how to carry War once more into the Country of the Infidels. Prince Edward's late taking the Cross, put Lewis in hopes of better success, if he could persuade him to join with him. To that purpose, he desired him to come to Paris, where he communicated to him his Project. Edward wished for nothing more, than to join Forces with so powerful a Prince, and to command under him. But he intimated to him, that he could not be ready soon enough, for want of Money for the Voyage. Lewis, glad to find there was no other Objection; lent him thirty thousand Marks (14), for which Edward mortgaged to him the Revenues of Bourdeaux, for seven Years. This Agreement being made, Edward returned into England. The King his Father had now assembled a Parliament, which granted him a twentieth Part of the Moveables of the Kingdom, part whereof was to be employed towards the Charges of the Prince's Expedition.

Before Edward was ready for his Departure, the King of the Romans arrived (15) with a new Wife, he had married in Germany, not so much for her Riches as her Beauty (16).

A little before the Departure of the Croisades, Henry caused the Relicks of Edward the Confessor, for which he had a particular Veneration, to be removed. This Ceremony, to which all the considerable Men of the Kingdom were invited, was performed with great Pomp. The Shrine of the Saint, adorned with precious Stones, was carried on the Shoulders of the King himself, and his Brother the King of the Romans, with the Princes, and chief Lords, and placed in the new Church of Weyminster, which was just finished, and rendered the most stately Church then in Europe (17).

The Calm England enjoyed for some time, was like to be disturbed by the Suspensions, the Earl of Gloucester entertained of Prince Edward. The Earl not believing the Prince was heartily reconciled to him, kept from Court, and always found some Excuse to be absent from the Parliaments. This Behaviour made the King very uneasy, who was afraid the Earl had still a design to break the Peace. But the King of the Romans freed him from

Whilst these things passed in England, the King of France altered his Design. Instead of going directly to the Holy-Land, according to his first Intention, he failed to Africa, at the Instance of Charles King of Sicily, his Brother, who was at Variance with the King of Tunis. He expected the African Prince to pay him the same Tribute as his Predecessors paid to the Emperor, with all the Arrears that were due. To support these Pretensions, Lewis landed his Army in Africa, and was preparing to besiege Tunis. But the Moorish King chose rather to promise to pay what was demanded, than hazard the Loss of his Dominions.

Lewis was failed for Africa, when Edward departed from Portsmouth (2) to take up the Princess his Spouse at Bourdeaux, from whence they went together and embarked at Aigues Mortes, where their Fleet waited for them. They joined the King of France before Tunis, where he was staying for the Performance of the Treaty made with the Moors. How urgent soever Edward was with this Monarch, to persuade him to continue his Voyage to Palestine, he could not prevail with him to stir before he had received full Satisfaction from the King of Tunis. As Edward was not concerned in that Affair, he resolved to pass the Winter in Sicily, with design to proceed for the Holy-Land in the Beginning of the Spring. He had scarce left the Coasts of Africa when the Pestilence broke out in the Camp of the French; and raged in such a manner, that it not only swept away the private Soldiers, but also the principal Officers. The King himself being at last seized with it, resigned his Breath (3) in the Arms of his eldest Son Philip, who thought of nothing but returning to France (4).

Though by Lewis's Death, Edward lost all hopes of making any great Progress in Palestine, he continued his Voyage, and arrived there, according to his Vow (5). Mean time, Philip's return to France giving him some cause to fear for Guienne, he resolved to send thither his Cousin Henry, Son of the King of the Romans, to watch the Motions of the French. This young Prince, posting to Bourdeaux, passed through Viterbo, a City in the Pope's Dominions, where he had a mind to make some stay, which cost him his Life. Guido de Montfort, Son to the late Earl of Leicester, being then at that place, and seeing the Prince go into a Church, followed him, and murdered him before the High-Altar, in revenge of his Father's Death, slain in the Battle of Evesham. But the Murderer's Pretence to vindicate this infamous Action, could not be more unjust, since neither this Prince, nor his Father the King of the Romans, were present at that Battle, being then both under Confinement (6).

Edward's Progress in the Holy-Land was not great. However, with the few Troops he had, he let the Saracens see what they were to expect from him, in case he came to be assisted with more Forces. His Valour, Fame, and the Reputation of King Richard his Great-Uncle who had performed such famous Exploits in that Country, terrified the Infidels, that, to free themselves from their Fears, they sent an Assassin to dispatch him. The Villain, under colour of settling a Correspondence between Edward and the Governour of Joppa, who feigned a desire to turn Christian, found means to be admitted into the Prince's Presence, and frequently to discourse with him. At last, one Day as he was alone in his Chamber (7), he was just going to stab him with a Dagger in the Belly, if Edward had not warded off the Blow with his Arm, where he received a dangerous Wound (8). The Assassin, enraged at this Disappointment, was about to redouble his Blow with greater Violence; but Edward gave him such a Kick on the Breast, that he beat him down backward, and leaping upon him at the same time, wrested the Dagger out of his Hand, and killed him immediately. The Prince's Wound was much more dangerous than it appeared to be, by reason the Dagger was poisoned. The Wound beginning to gangrene, made all despair of a Cure; but happily for him, there was then in the Army a skilful Chirurgeon who delivered him from this Danger. Some affirm, he owed his Life to the tender Love of Eleanora his Spouse, who ventured to suck the Venom out of the Wound. But this Circumstance is mentioned by no Author of that time (9). This Prince was brought to Bed at Acre, of a Daughter, called Jean de Acre from the Place of her Birth, according to the Custom of those Days (10).

Whilst Edward was in Palestine, Theobald, Archbishop of Liege, who attended him thither, received the News of his Election to the Papal Throne. He set out immediately for Rome, where he assumed the Name of Gregory X. (11).

Edward's Army daily diminished, either by Sicknes or several Battles with the Saracens, without his having any hopes of Supplies from France or elsewhere. This Contention obliged him, though with great Reluctance, to propose to the Sultan a Truce, which after a short Negotiation was concluded for Ten Years, Ten Months, and Ten Days, both Parties being to keep what they possessed. Nothing detaining Edward any longer in Palestine, he embarked his Troops, and set sail for England (12).

During his Absence, the King his Father enjoyed a perfect Tranquillity, which was disturbed only by the Death of the King of the Romans his Brother. It is said this Prince's Grief for the tragical Death of his Son, threw him into a Fit of Sicknes, which laid him in his Grave. Edmund, his other Son, succeeded him as Earl of Cornwall, with which Title he was invested by the King his Uncle (13).

Shortly after, there was a Sedition at Norwich, occasioned by a Quarrel between the Citizens and Monks, in which the Cathedral and Monastery adjoining were reduced to Ashes by the Townsmen. Henry, resolving not to let this Riot go unpunished, went in Person to Norwich, where he caused the Offenders to be severely punished (14). In returning to London he was seized at St. Edmundsbury with a languishing Distemper, which not seeming to be dangerous, hindered him not from continuing his Journey to London. But his Sicknes increasing after his Arrival, he died in a few Days, aged sixty six Years, whereof he had reigned fifty six, and twenty Days. He ordered that his Body should be interred near the Shrine of Edward the Confessor in the Abbey-Church of Westminster, where his Tomb [with his Statue in Brass] is still to be seen (15).

This Prince's Character so visibly appears in all the Circumstances of his Life, that it will be needless to draw it more fully. His narrow Genius, his Eshinels to be governed by proud and self-interested Counsellors, his inconstant and capricious Temper, and the Notions of arbitrary Power instilled into him from his very Youth, were the real Causes of the Troubles which disturbed his Reign. Too weak when there was occasion for Steadiness, and too

(1) A very remarkable Accident happened this Year, which, though it is of a private Nature, may be worth mentioning. A Suit had been long depending between John Earl of Hereford and Henry, and John Lord Zouch, concerning a certain Manor; which coming to a Tryal before the King's Justices in Westminster Hall, there happened to [10] very respectful Language between the Earl and the said Baron; and they at last came to Blow, a quarrel that the Earl and his Friends, being privately armed, set upon the Lord Zouch and his eldest Son in open Court, and wounded them both. After which both Ales and his eldest Son fled to the River of Rye in Surrey, and stood upon his Defence, but Prince Edward was sent with some Forces to reduce him to Obedience, and at last he was taken five thousand Pounds to the King, and two thousand to the Lord Zouch and his Son. *T. 1472. haughtily when it was necessary to stoop and accommodate himself to the Times, he seemed to flit incessantly to act contrary to his own Interests. Nothing can be said of his Courage, since he never gave any sensible Proof of it. But he may be justly commended for his Contenance, and Aversion to every thing that looked like Cruelty, being always fatigued with punishing the Rebels in their Purges, when he might have spilt their Blood on the Scaffold. He was exceeding greedy of Money, but it was to squander it away so idly, that the vast Sums he levied upon his Subjects made him never the richer. How pressing soever his Necessities were, he could not help lavishing his Money upon his Favorites, not considering his great Pains to obtain Aids from his Parliament. This Profuseness, and the immense Sums fruitlessly employed in the unfortunate Affair of Stirling, were the principal Causes of the Mortifications and Disgraces he was exposed to during the whole Course of his Life (1).

Four things especially render this Reign remarkable. The first is, the Readiness wherewith the Barons in league against King John returned to the Obedience of their young Sovereign, the Moment they thought their Privileges out of Danger. The second is, the Patience of the Barons, for above forty Years, though the little regard Henry had for them, and the continual Breaches of his Oaths, gave them but too much cause to complain. In the third Place it is to be observed, that to the Troubles which distracted this Reign, the English are indebted for the Liberties and Privileges they still enjoy at this Day. If the Barons of those Days had been more passive, it may be very justly supposed, that the two Charters of King John would have been buried in eternal Oblivion. If their Revolt proved in the end fatal to themselves, at least it was beneficial to their Posterity, since the Kings, Successors of Henry, dreading to expose themselves to the like Dangers, durst not any more venture to revoke the Charters, which are the Basis and Foundation of the Liberty of the English. Accordingly, they had time to be so strongly established by Degrees, that there was no annulling them. Let the Earl of Leicester be exclaimed against never so much, let him be called impious and wicked for daring to take up Arms against his Sovereign, at least it must be confessed, that his Ambition has produced happy Effects for the whole English Nation. The fourth remarkable thing is, the Tyranny of the Roman Pontiffs, who abusing their Power, treated the Clergy of England with inconceivable Rigour. I should add here an Article of no less Importance, I mean the Origin of the House of Commons, if the thing were not liable to so many Disputes.

Of nine Children Henry III. had by Elisavere of Provence his Wife, only two Sons and two Daughters survived him, the rest dying in their Infancy (2). Edward his eldest Son was his Successor. Edmond his second Son, after a vain Expectation of the Crown of the two Sicilies which the Pope had flattered him with, was Earl of Lancaster, Leicester, and Derby, Lord of Monmouth, and High Steward of England. Margaret his eldest Daughter, was married at nine Years of Age to Alexander III. King of Scotland, to whom she left but one Daughter of her own Name, Wife of Eric King of Norway. By this Marriage came a Princess of the same Name, of whom I shall have occasion to speak in the following Reign. Beatrice, second Daughter to Henry was married to John de Dreux, Duke of Bretagne (3).

(1) W. Rishanger says, he was of a middle Stature, strong, and well set; and that one of his Eyes was half closed, so too soon.

(2) Of nine Children, three, William, Richard, John, and Henry, were buried at Windsor, and the fourth, named William, in the New-temple, near St. Dunstons. Edward his third Child, which was born November 29. 1255, died at five Years of Age, and lies buried in Windsor Abbey.

(3) As to the following remarkable thing, not taken notice of by Rapin, were transmitted by Frederick and Water Ordel, though never taken away by Act of Parliament, was by King Henry's Command laid aside by the Judges, and soon after grew quite out of use. In 1255, King Henry built a House at St. Dunstons in the Old-temple (where the Rolls now stand) for the converted Jews, and an Hospital at Oxford, near the Bridge. M. Paris, p. 395. Weights and Measures were thus fixed: An English Penny called a Stirling, round and without clipping, was to weigh thirty two Wheat Corn taken out of the midst of the Ear, and twenty Pennies were to make an Ounce, twelve Ounces one Pound, and eight Pounds a Gallon of Wine, and eight Gallons of Wine a London Buttel, which is the eighth Part of a Quarter.

Having largely treated of Seigniorial the last Coin-Note, I proceed now to Tallage. There were two sorts of Tallage, one paid to the King, the other to a feudal Lord. The Tallage rendered to the King, was raised upon his Demesnes, Ecclesiasticks, and Wardships; and upon the Burghs and Towns of the Realm. In older Times, it was called Danum and Affisa. Danum was a general word, and used with great Latitude. When it was paid out of King's Fees, it was called Seignior; when by Towns and Burghs, it was Tallage; when out of Lands, which were not of military Tenure, it signified Hidage. So that Danum signified Seignior; and in the beginning of Henry II. In the succeeding times, Danum came to be used chiefly for Tallage. Tallage was also called Affisa. The word Affisa, signified among other things, an Assessment. It is used for the common Charge or Assessment, made upon a County for Defaults, and other Amercements. The County of Berk was charged with thirty one Shillings and three Pence de common Affisa, of that County for Defaults. Mag. Rot. 19. Hen. I. These Taxes or Land-taxes, properly, Tallage to the King, which he had in his own Hands. Hence Tallage are commonly called, Tallage Manerium & tenementum Regis, quia tunc erat in manu Regis, Tallage Domini, and the like. Under the Terms que erant in manu Regis, were comprehended the King's Ecclesiasticks and Wardships. For the King held them tantum in Dominiis. And in fact, the King's Ecclesiasticks and Wardships were wont to be tallaged, when Tallage was assessed upon his Demesnes. Moreover, some Seigniorials, of an ignoble and inferior kind, and such as had no military Service annexed to them, were wont to be tallaged with the King's Demesnes. But it is to be understood, that the King's Seigniorials were not to be tallaged without a special Precept. If Men were not the King's, immediate Tenants, they were tallageable, not to the King, but to their immediate Lord. The Tallage assessed upon the King's Demesnes, were more heavy, than the Tallage upon other Persons, living in the Counties at large. For which Reason Men sometimes petitioned, that they might be tallaged with the Commonalty of the County, and not with the Tenants in ancient Demesne. When a Town was tallaged, the Tallage was raised upon the Men of the Town, and many of the County, and not with the Tenants in ancient Demesne. When a Town was tallaged, it was made Merchandise in the Town. If the King granted away a Demesne Manor, or granted any such Manor, or granted a temporary Estate in it, he used to reserve the Tallage to himself and his Heirs. There was also in ancient Times, a Duty paid to the King, under the Name of Carucage, to wit, so much for each Caruc of Land, holden by him, or inferior Tenants. To the head of Tallage, (or else to that of Aid), may be referred the Naves, Dynes, Quintines, Plintines, Trentines, which were so called by the Quantity or Proportion of the Payment, as their Name imports. The most ancient Instance of a Tallage, called by the Name of Quintine, is in the sixth of Richard I. These Quintines, and some others, were partly Seigniorial, and partly Military. The Form of Taxing and Levying the Naves, &c. with the Oaths taken by the Taxors, and the Commissions of the Collectors, are to be seen upon the Revenue Rolls. In these Cases, the Goods of the chief Taxors were to be taxed by the Treasurer and Baron of the Exchequer, and the Robes, and Yardens of the Citizens and Burgesses, were not usually taxed with their other Goods and Moveables. In the most ancient Times, the Tallage were usually imposed, and set by the King's Justices in their respective Iters. Afterwards, by Commissioners appointed by the King for that Purpose. Anciently after the Tallage had been assessed, they were usually collected by the Sheriffs of the several Counties. But if a Town happened to be set at Arms to a particular Person, then Sheriff, then the Tallage was commonly collected and answered for by the Farmer, or Provost thereof. Tallage was wont to be assessed upon the Men of the Demesnes and Towns, sometimes in Groats, in Communi; sometimes by Poll, per Capita, or per Strangum; at other times, partly one of those ways, and partly the other. If the Assessment of Tallage over-rated any Man, he used to obtain a Writ framed upon his Case, directed to the Barons of the Exchequer, who by virtue thereof, would relieve him according to Equity. Sometimes Men were admitted to compound for the Tallage imposed on them, by paying a Fine to the King for the same. Tallage was not demandable from Lands holden in Frankalmoigne. Neither was Tallage chargeable upon Lands holden by Knight's Service. Moreover the King, if he pleased, granted to particular Persons, a Freedom from Tallage. For Example, the Templars and Hospitallers of Jerusalem, by a very ancient Grant from the Crown, had the Privilege of having each one Man, (called Le Hysse) in every Burgh in England, who was to be quit of common Aid or Tallage, assessed within the Burgh. As the King had Tallage of his Demesne-Men, so some sovereign or private Lords, had Tallage of theirs. Most of these latter Tallages were also Seigniorial. It appears by ancient Records, that many of the Lands which were Tallageable to private Lords, were such as at one time or other moved from the King, and were wont to be tallaged to him, whilst they were vested in the Crown. As when the King granted a Subject, a Demesne Manor, or Town, together with the Homages, Aids, Tallage, and other Profits, to hold to the Grantee, and his Heirs. In such Case, the Grantee had Power to Tallage the Men of such Manor or Town, to his own use, when the King tallaged his Demesne and Manors, throughout England; but not otherwise, nor in other manner, than the King raised Tallage in his own Demesne. For the Tenants were not by the King's Grant Tallageable to the private Lord, in any other manner, than they would have been to the King, if the Seignior had still retained in the Crown. And when such a private Lord went to raise Tallage, he used to have a Writ, (de habendo rationabiliter tallage) to the Sheriff of the County, to raise the same. As the King had divers ways of raising Money upon his Demesne-Men, so inferior Lords dealt with their Demesne-Men, after the like manner. But though the Tallages, &c. paid to the King, do readily appear by the Revenue Rolls and other Records; those formerly rendered to inferior Lords by their Demesne-Men, are not so easily discovered at this Day, having in great Measure passed under privacy and silence, except that they are sometimes disclosed in Pleas, moved between such Lords and their Men; and likewise in the Revenue Rolls, when the Seigniorials of those Lords happened to be in the King's hands, by Ecclesiasticks, Vassals, or Wardships. Private Lords seem to have treated their Tallageable Men, with greater Severity, than the King treated his. For sometimes the Farmers have chosen to be Tallageable to the King, rather than to such Lords; and accordingly have come to the King's Court, and alleged, they were Tallageable to the King. There are some of the Names relating to Tallage, which the ancient Records furnish us withal. In the succeeding Times, a different Law now Usage were, by Degrees, introduced. There is a Place published by Talbot and Ricard, among the old Statutes, under the Title, Statute de Tallagio non concedendo, which contains a Catalogue of four Clauses: It begins Nullus Indulgentia, and ends vere imponatur. Sir Edmond Coke refers this Statute (if it be one) to the 34 Edw. I. But Mr. Madox says, he could not find this pretended Statute in any Roll or Record. THE
DURING THE Reigns of HENRY II, RICHARD I, JOHN LACKLAND, and HENRY III.

State of the Church.

DURING the four last Reigns which we have just gone through, the Affairs of the Church were so mixed with those of the State, that there was a necessity of relating them together. And indeed, the Contests between Henry II, and Thomas Becket, and between John and Innocent III, and the Tyranny exercised by the Popes in England under Henry III, furnish the chief Materials for the Ecclesiastical History of these three Reigns. That of Richard I, was the only one where the Church had no influence; unless we are to consider the Crusade, in which that Prince was engaged, as an Affair purely Ecclesiastical. There are who look upon these four Reigns as a time of Triumph for the Church, because in their notion of the Church the Pope and Clergy only are included. Others are of Opinion, this was a time of Oppression and Slavery, because Christians were exposed to the Oppressions of the Popes, who shamefully abused the Authority they were suffered to assume.

The bare Reading of the History of these four Reigns is sufficient to shew, it is not without reason that I have so much enlarged on the prodigious Increase of the Papal Power, since it was to be the principal Subject of the ensuing History. We have seen the pernicious Effects of this Power assumed by the Popes. It remains now to shew on what Principles they established their Authority, and the Consequences they drew from thence, to extend it more and more. This is a thing the more worthy of notice, as it is to be considered as the Spring of all the remarkable Events which happened in the Church of England for several Centuries.

Principles on which the Ecclesiastical Power was established. First Principle.

The first Principle was, That Jesus Christ committed the Instruction of the Faithful, to the care of the Ministers of his Church, from whence were drawn these two Inferences. First, That the Faithful ought to submit to the Decisions of these same Ministers in matters of Faith. Secondly, That Laymen had no manner of Right to decide, or even to examine, the Difficulties which might arise about these matters, but ought implicitly to follow the Determinations of the Ecclesiastics. This manifestly supposes Infallibility in the Ministers of the Church. But as this Supposition was founded upon the Promises of Christ to his Church in general, and as the Consequence drawn from thence, for the Infallibility of the Ministers in particular, was not sufficiently evident, an Expedient was found to blind the Eyes of the World, by confounding the general Notion of the Church with that of the Clergy in particular. Thus by degrees the Clergy alone were called the Church, and to them only were applied the Promises of Christ made to all Christians in general. So that, in saying with Christ, the Gates of Hell should not prevail against the Church, they expressly meant, that the Clergy or Councils, wholly consisting of the several Members of the Clergy, should be infallible in their Decisions. The Misinterpretation therefore of the Word Church, was one of the chief Causes of the Blindness of Christians. The Reader will be able to extend his Reflections on this Head; for I purpose only just to point out the several Steps by which the Ecclesiastical Power is arrived to so prodigious a Height.

Second Principle.

The second Principle was, That Jesus Christ not only appointed Ministers in his Church, for the Instruction of the Faithful, but also to inspect their Life and Conversation. Hence it was intended, That it belonged to the Pastors to declare to their Flocks, what was just and agreeable to the Laws of God, and what not. From this Principle was drawn this farther Consequence, that not only they had a Right to exhort the Faithful, and censure them when they neglected their Duty, but also to punish them when in a state of Impenitence.

Third Principle.

For a third Principle it was laid down, That the Church of Jesus Christ ought to be pure and holy, without Spot or Wrinkle, and therefore it was necessary to use all possible Endeavours to prevent her being polluted either with Sins or Errors. Now as, by the foregoing Principles, the Clergy alone had the Right of Instruction and Inspection, it followed, that to them belonged the care of preserving the Purity of the Church.

This led to a fourth Principle, That in order to preserve the Church pure, it was necessary to cut off the rotten Branches. The consequence from thence was, that when a Christian suffered himself to be corrupted either by Sin or Error, he was to be excommunicated, that is, cut off from the Body of the Church. It is very easy to see, that according to the foregoing Principles, it was the Clergy's Business to perform this Cutting-off, and that they acquired thereby a great Authority, and a profound respect from all Christians.

If the Governors of the Church had all been Holy and Infallible, these several Principles with their Inferences, would have produced only good Effects, and a Discipline very profitable to Salvation would have been preserved in the Church. But they happen'd to be too frequently sway'd by Interest, Caprice, or the Impulse of an ill-governed Zeal. And therefore, it could not but be thought very improbable, that God should subject his Church to the Passions and Prejudices of his Ministers. Hence it was natural to conclude, either these Principles were false, or at least, the Consequences carried too far. This Belief could scarce fail to breed a Contempt for unjust and rash Excommunications, which had even some Influence on the most regular. Every one is very naturally inclined to imagine himself unjustly condemned. From this Contempt proceeded an Unconcern in the Persons excommunicated to be reconciled to the Church, and to give her the Satisfaction she required.

If in the Excommunications, the Clergy had only aimed at preserving the Church's Purity, they would have been contented with cutting off the rotten Members, and grieving at the Obstinacy of those who neglected to be absolved. But this was not what affected them most: Satisfaction was their chief Concern. The Reason is, because most of the Excommunications were thundered against such as encroached on the Lands or Immunities of the Clergy, to whom alone the Name of Church was all along appropriated. It was necessary therefore, for the Interest of the Clergy, to oblige those who were cut off from the Body of the Church, to be reconciled to her, and give her Satisfaction. For this Cause another Principle was established: That spiritual Penalties not being sufficient to conquer the Obstinacy of hardened Sinners, it was necessary, for the Glory of God to make use of temporal Punishments, to force them to Obedience. Upon this Foundation, the Clergy, who were already in possession of regulating all Matters relating to Religion, came to this Decision in their Councils: That excommunicated Persons were not only to be separated from the Assemblies of the Church, but also from all Intercourse with us Faithful. If this rigorous Law had been strictly observed, the Excommunicated would quickly have ended their Days for want of the Assistance, which Men naturally give one another, unless they had chosen to go and live among the Infidels. But as it was not possible to hinder their Relations and Friends from affording them some Relief, though the contrary often happened, another Expedient was found to put the Persons cut off from the Church under a Necessity to submit to her Orders, that is, to those of the Clergy. It was ordained in the Councils, that if within forty Days after Excommunication, the Party excommunicated did not sue to be reconciled to the Church, the Magistrate, upon the Bishop's Complaint, should be obliged to cast him into Prison, and confine him to his Estate. So that when a Christian was excommunicated municated, he was to expect to lose his Liberty and Property, or make the Church such Satisfaction, as the Church herself, that is, the Clergy, should judge proper. This Decree of the Councils would hardly have been enacted into a Law, if Sovereigns had not found their Advantage in it, by means of the Consecrations. They did not expect, that this severe Treatment was ever like to reach them. But when once they admitted the Principle of the unlimited Authority assumed by the Church, they quickly experienced that, as Christians, they had no more Privilege than their Subjects. The Popes, whose Power daily increased, extended it at length over crown'd Heads. They made no scruple to excommunicate Princes themselves, who were frequently deferted by their own Subjects and Domesticks, and to deprive them of their Kingdoms, and give them to others.

The same Principle, then established for private Persons, extended to Kings and Emperors. There was at first but one Thing which distinguished an excommunicated Prince from a private Person: namely, that his Subjects were bound to him by an Oath, which many could not think of violating, on pretence that their Sovereign was excommunicated. But the Popes found means to remove this Scruple, by absolving them from their Oath of Allegiance, by the Plenitude of their Apostolical Power. This was in consequence of the Maxim before established, That an excommunicated Person was to be deprived of his Possessions.

All this, however, was not sufficient to compel excommunicated Princes, to give the Church the Satisfaction demanded. There were many of their Subjects, who were not convinced, that the Pope had Power to excommunicate Sovereigns. Others were of Opinion, that as long as a King was on the Throne; his Subjects ought not to refuse him the Obedience due to him. Some, though persuaded of the Pope's Authority, thought it unlawful to take up Arms against the King actually reigning. Others again durst not venture on so hazardous an Undertaking, which might end in their own and their Families Ruin. To surmount these Difficulties, the Popes bethought themselves of these two Things. The first was, to depose excommunicated and obstinate Kings, in a Council, or only in a Consistory, in order to remove all Scruples from their Subjects. The second was, to commission some powerful Prince to execute their Sentence, to the end that joining with those Subjects who were only restrained by Fear, the deposed Prince might be compelled to submit to the Church. Of this, without going any farther, we have seen a terrible Instance in the Quarrel between Innocent III. and King John.

In this manner, from Principles which might be originally Good, considered in themselves, such Consequences were drawn, as tended to erect the spiritual Jurisdiction of the Church, into a temporal and absolute Monarchy. Indeed, could a Christian help regarding, as his real Masters, Men, who disposed of his Estate, his Honour, his Life, and his Salvation? What is more strange, is, that Christians should themselves be so blind, as to admit all these Principles, with their unlimited Consequences, and suffer such a System to be built thereon, as wholly tended to enslave them. It is true, it was thought at last, though too late, necessary to set Bounds to the absolute Power, assumed by the Pope and Clergy, and extended by degrees over all sorts of Things. But there was strong Opposition, and a Resistance so much the greater, as Time had been given them to confirm themselves in their Usurpations.

This is the principal Subject of the Ecclesiastical History of England, during several Centuries, and especially during the four Reigns now before us. Except a few Events, it contains only Affairs resulting from the exorbitant Power ingrossed by the Pope and the Clergy. The sole Aim of the Councils, was to maintain the Privileges and Immunities of the Church, that is, of the Clergy: For these two are generally confounded. All the Papal Projects tended only to extend their Authority, as well over the Laity, and the Sovereigns themselves, as over the Clergy. If they have not been able to keep the excessive Power to which they were arrived, it is entirely owing to the ill Use they made of it: Which caused them to lose by degrees the Regard paid to every Thing flowing from the Holy See. The bare Facts related in this History, concerning the Affair of Thomas Becket, the deposing of King John, and the Oppressions England endured from Rome, during the long Reign of Henry III. are sufficient to convince all reasonable and unprejudiced Persons, of the Rigour, wherewith the Popes exercised the Authority, they had been suffered to assume. How much more convincing would it be, should we add to these Influences, what passed on the same Subject, in all the other Christian Kingdoms? But to confine my self wholly to England, I shall only remark, that Becket's Affair carried the Pope's Power in England higher than ever, after a Prince, so haughty as Henry II. was forced to submit to a shameful Discipline. The Homage, King John was obliged to do the Pope, raised this Power to its utmost Height. From that time, the Popes looked upon England as a conquered Country, with which they did not think themselves obliged to keep any Measures. This is manifest throughout the whole Reign of Henry III.

It must be further observed, that if the Rigour wherewith the Popes treated England, served for some time to keep the Kingdom in Subjection, it proved in the end the chief Cause of the decay of their Power, when Circumstances came to be altered. As they carried it too far, they made the English, naturally jealous of their Liberty, desire to throw off so intolerable a Yoke. Accordingly, when a favorable Juncture offered, they failed not to improve it, and the rather as they found themselves supported by the Clergy, who felt, no less than the People, the Effects of the Pope's Tyranny. This will appear in some of the following Reigns. Mean time, we are to consider the Days of John and Henry III. as those wherein the Papal Power was at the highest in England, and, if I mistake not, in most other Kingdoms of Europe. I might confirm my Assertion with numberless Proofs, if what has been said did not appear to me sufficient. They who desire to see a more particular Account, of the unjust and violent Proceedings of the Court of Rome, with respect to England, during the Reigns of John and Henry III. may, for their Satisfaction, consult the History of Matthew Paris, who treats of them at large. It is true indeed, Endeavours have been used to destroy the Credit of this Author. But Men of Sense don't look upon, as an Evidence of Unfaithfulness, bare Allegations without Proofs.

The frequent Contests about the Elections of Bishops Concerning whom Electors, make also a considerable Article of the Affairs of the Church. But as I have had frequent occasion to speak of them, it will be needless to enlarge any further upon that Subject. It will suffice to point out in general, what served for Foundation to these Disputes. As to the See of Canterbury, the Monks of St. Augustin's pretended, that the Right of electing the Archbishops, belonged to them exclusive of all others. But the Suffragan Bishops of that See maintained, they had an equal Right with the Monks. On the other hand, the Court would not willingly suffer any to be promoted to the Archiepiscopal Dignity, but whom they approved of. So that, directly or indirectly, the Court had all along a great share in the Elections. These several Interests were the occasion, that hardly could an Archbishop be chosen without some Contest. One while, because the Monks elected without consulting the Suffragan Bishops, another while, because the Bishops made a different Choice from that of the Monks. Sometimes the Monks themselves made a double Election; and sometimes it happened, that the Prelate not being agreeable to the King, could not obtain his Confirmation. The Court of Rome reaped great Advantages from these Controversies, since to her was referred the Decision thereof. Upon these occasions the Popes made it a Rule, to declare in favour of him, who appeared best affected to the Holy See. Oftentimes, by the Fulness of their Apostolical Power, they annulled the Elections made with unanimous Consent, and caused whom they pleased to be elected. Of this we meet with several Instances in the History of England.

These Dissentions reigned almost as much in the Elections of the other Bishops and Abbots. The Court had ever among those that had a Right to vote, a Party, which generally carried it from the others. At least, it was strong enough to hinder the Election of such as were disagreeable to the King. Whatever happened, they raised Disputes, which were referred to the Pope's Decision. Then it was that the King made use of such means with the Pope, as seldom failed of Success. This frequently occurs in the History of the Church of England. But it suffices to have made here these few Remarks, without its being necessary to insist any farther on this Head.

The Immunities very often granted by the Court of Rome, to Churches and Monasteries, in Prejudice of the Bishops, were moreover a fertile Source of Disputes. These Immunities regarded either the Visitation of the Religious Houses, or the Elections of the Abbots, or the Dispensation to some Bishops to be absent from the Councils. All these Articles produced an infinite Number of Suits, Suits, of which the whole Profit accrued to the Pope, who, under this pretence, commanded the Parties to repair to Rome to defend their respective Rights. When once they were there, they never saw the end of their Suits, unless by Priests they found means to procure dispatch; and he that gave most, generally came off best. Of this it would not be difficult to give several Instances. But there is no occasion to prove a Fact so well known and avowed. It is time now to proceed to the Councils during the four Reigns we are speaking of.

COUNCILS in the Reign of HENRY II.

A mixed Council.

IN the Year 1155, being the first of Henry II, a mixed Council was held in London, consisting of Bishops and Barons, where were debated several Affairs relating to the Church and State. I took notice of this Assembly, on purpose to shew that the Use of these mixed Councils was not yet entirely abolished.

Council against Becket.

In 1166 a Synod was held which appealed to the Pope, from the Excommunication denounced by Thomas Becket against those that observed the Constitutions of Clarendon.

Council of Oxford against the Publicans. W. Nott. l. 2. c. 33. See the Council of Oxford.

The same Year, according to Dr. Hody, but six Years sooner, according to Spehnan, and according to others, four only. Henry II ordered a Council to meet at Oxford, to examine the Tenets of certain Hereticks called Publicans, of whom I have already spoken in the Reign of that Prince. Very probably, they were Disciples of the Waldenses, who began then to appear. When they were asked, in the Council, who they were, they answered, they were Christians, and Followers of the Doctrine of the Apostles. After that, being questioned upon the Articles of the Creed, their Replies were very Orthodox as to the Trinity and Incarnation. But if William of Newburgh is to be credited, they rejected Baptism, the Eucharist, Marriage, and the Communion of Saints. They shewed a great deal of Modesty and Meekness in their whole Behaviour. When they were threatened with Death, in order to oblige them to renounce their Tenets, they only said, Blessed are they that suffer for Righteousness Sake. The Council, finding there was no prevailing upon them, delivered them over to the secular Power. Unhappily for them, the King, being then at variance with the Pope, was afraid of giving him an advantage, if they were spared. Upon this Account he treated them more severely than he would have done at any other time. After causing them to be branded with a hot Iron, he forbid under great Penalties all Persons to give them the least Relief. They suffered this hard Treatment very cheerfully, and as they could meet with no Assistance, either to stay in the Kingdom or to go from thence, they all miserably perished. This is all the Historians have related concerning these pretended Hereticks, without telling us why they were called Publicans. I observed they were very likely Disciples of the Waldenses, because of their Orthodoxy on the Trinity and Incarnation of the Son of God, their Patience, and their Answer to the Council that they followed the Doctrine of the Apostles, for that was precisely the Language of the Waldenses. It is true, we cannot trace the Waldenses in the Tenets ascribed to them concerning Baptism, the Eucharist, Marriage, and the Communion of Saints. But possibly the Historians, who mention them, may have misrepresented their Doctrine. Perhaps they did not believe Transubstantiation, and refusing to communicate with such as did believe it, it was inferred they rejected the Eucharist and Communion of Saints. As for Baptism, perhaps they would, with the Waldenses, have it strip of all the Ceremonies, tacked to it since its Institution. In fine, it may be they denied Marriage to be a Sacrament, and on that account were accused of rejecting it. However this be, they would not be the first, to whom have been ascribed Doctrines little agreeable to their Sentiments, by forced Consequences, as it is easy to see from the History of the Waldenses and Albigenses, &c. What I have been saying is however only conjecture. But it is sufficiently plausible, to make one stand amazed at the Rashness of some Prevalent Authors, who, upon the Credit of Henry, of Newburgh the Monk, and some others of the same Order, have so roughly handled these pretended Hereticks.

Gregory in his Canonicall Epistles speaks of another Council convened by Henry II, where he says, that Prince caused the Bishops to swear to obey his Orders, before I need inform them of his Intentions. He adds, that as a Consequence of this Oath, he would have obliged them to withdraw their Obedience from Alexander III, and own the Antipope: But that the Prelates flatly refused it. It seems that Gregory, who was a Monk of St. Agellin's, and Contemporary with Becket, should have perfect Knowledge of all that passed in that Archbishop's Contest with the King. But as he is extremely partial in Favour of Becket, and besides, no other Historian speaks of this Council, one can hardly doubt its being a Fiction. The only Foundation for it, is Henry's writing to the Archbishop of Colchester, as was said in the History of his Reign. I shall just observe here, that certain modern Historians, relying too much on the Authority of Gregory, who was Becket's Creature, have unwarily taken him for guide in their Account of this Quarrel. Hence they have been led to favour the Archbishop, and infinuate as if he was unjustly persecuted by the King. This, added to what I remarked in the foregoing Instance, shews how easily Historians suffer themselves to be drawn insensibly into the Notions (2) or Prejudices of those that have writ before them.

In 1175, Richard Archbishop of Canterbury convened in Westminster (3) a national Synod, where he caused to be read some Canons, drawn up by himself. They mostly relate to Ecclesiastical Discipline, and the Celibacy of the Priests, which was not yet thoroughly established. Roger, Archbishop of York, was not present at this Synod, but sent Agents, who protested, in his Name, against three things wherein he thought himself aggrieved. First, he complained of being denied the Privilege of having the Cross carried before him, in the Province of Canterbury. In the second place, he complained, that the Bishopsricks of Lincoln, Chesler, Worcester [and Hersford] were unjustly taken from the Jurisdiction of the See of York. His third Grievance was, on account of an Excommunication denounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury against some Clergymen of St. Oswald's in Glasgow. Hence it is evident, that the old Disputes between the two Metropolitans were still kept on foot, notwithstanding the Care taken to put an end to them, in the Reign of Henry I.

What passed the next Year 1176, in a Synod held by Gregory, Hugues the Pope's Legate (4), is a farther Evidence of this Matter. The Archbishop of York seating himself on the Right-hand of the Legate (5), the Archbishop of Canterbury's Domesticks fell upon him and dragged him thence, and trampled upon him. This Accident caused the Synod to break up, and was followed with a long Process, which occasioned the two Metropolitans to carry to the Court of Rome several Appeals, from whence the reaped great Advantages (6).

In the Year 1183, the Pope desiring Henry II to procure him a Subsidy from the Clergy, to enable him to carry on the War against the Emperor, the King assembled the Prelates, to acquaint them with the Pope's Demand. The Clergy not daring to refuse the Aid the Pontiff required, and on the other hand, dreading it might be made a Precedent, contrary to the Liberties of the Church of England, used this Expedient to content him. They entreated the King to give the Pope what he thought reasonable, promising to repay him whatever he should advance (7).

In this Reign two Councils were held in Ireland, the first was convened, at Armagh, presently after the Conquests of the English. It was decreed in this Synod, that all the English Slaves should be enfranchised; the Prelates being persuaded that the Calamities, their Island began to suffer, proceeded from the Irish detaining in Slavery, Men, who were Christians as well as themselves. Besides, they considered, that Encouragement was given to Pyrates, by affording them an Opportunity of selling their Slaves in Ireland. The other Synod was held at Cashel, to put the Church of Ireland upon the same Foot with the Church of England; that is to say, to reduce the Irish Clergy under the Pope's Jurisdiction, pursuant to the King's Promise, when he demanded Adrian's Consent, to make that Conquest.

(1) The Waldenses hold that the Articles of their Faith, which they dedicated to the French King, who was then persecuting them. The Monks would have them lay out their Doctrine, but they came to a party of the Quakers of the Papists among themselves, and partly by the taking of Marshall de Lodi, a Protestant, who saved the Records of the Persecution, and in that Piece, when the Monks were to burn them, because they were contained an account of the Cruelties against the Waldenses, but proved, that their Doctrine was the same as that of the Apostles. This makes Rapin's Conjecture the more probable, and shews to be a Custom to Protestant Writers, not to condemn too hastily for Heretics, all that are represented as such by the Monks.

Before I finish what relates to the Councils in the Reign of Henry II, I shall add a word, concerning the XIth Council of Lateran, convened at Rome by Alexander III. There were only three English Bishops (1), at this Council; for, according to the Testimony of Roger de Hoveden, it was one of the Privileges of the Church of England, not to be obliged to send more than four Bishops to Councils held at Rome. The Abigones were excommunicated in this Council, and all Christians very strictly forbidden to keep any Correspondence with them.

One of the Canons prohibited, on pain of Excommunication, to promise Benefices before a Vacancy. But this Prohibition took place only with regard to Patrons, and not with respect to the Popes, who broke it continually, by means of Provisions, of which, in spite of this Canon, they made frequent use.

It was further resolved in this same Council to ease the vast Expence, Churches and Religious Houses were liable to, for the Entertainment of the Visitors, and their Retinue. It was decreed, that in Visitations, an Archbishop should not have in his Retinue more than fifty Horse, a Bishop more than thirty, a Legate more than twenty five, and an Arch-deacon more than seven. A great Reformation truly, which plainly shews the Moderation of the Council. The Charges the Abbies and Churches were at upon this occasion, were called Procurations; doubtless, because the Churches were obliged to procure what was necessary for the Entertainment of the Visitors. In process of time, this was turned into a certain Sum of Money, which kept all along the Name of Procurations, and became a fertile source of Oppressions, which the Nuncios and Legates made the Churches endure on this pretence. Tiltings and Tournaments were likewise forbidden; but this Prohibition was not capable of abolishing them.

COUNCILS in the Reign of RICHARD I.

IN 1189, Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, interdicting the Lands of Prince John, on account of his Marriage with his Cousin Avila of Gloucester, there was an Appeal to the Pope from this Procedure. Whereupon the Pope sent into England a Legate, one John de Anguino, who called a Synod, where the Archbishop's Proceedings were made void, and the Interdict taken off. After that, the Pope confirmed the Marriage by his Authority. Notwithstanding this decisive Sentence, the Marriage was annulled several Years after, on the same pretence of Kindred, and by the same Authority: every thing being easy to those that are invested with Absolute Power (2).

The same Baldwin being about to attend Richard to the Holy-Land, convened a Synod, where he declared, that he left the Administration of the Affairs of the Province of Canterbury to the Bishop of London, and of his particular Diocese to the Bishop of Rochester.

During the Absence of the two Archbishops, one of whom was in the East, the other in Normandy, the Bishop of Ely, Regent of the Kingdom, and Legate of the Pope, convened two Synods, one at Gloucester, and another at Westminster. But nothing of Moment was transacted, his Aim in calling them, being only to shew his Grandeur.

Baldwin dying at Acre, as soon as the News reached England, the Bishop of London sent an Inhibition to the Monks of St. Augustine, to proceed to an Election of an Archbishop, without the consent of the Suffragan Bishops. Some time after, the Suffragans being met at Canterbury, the Monks came into their Assembly, and declared they had elected the Bishop of Bath. At the same Instant, they took and placed him on the Archiepiscopal Throne. The Bishops appealed to the Pope: but the Death of the Prelate elect, which happened soon after, put an end to the Difference.

In 1193, Richard sent from Palestine, a Letter to the Suffragan Bishops of Canterbury, ordering them to proceed to the Election of an Archbishop, jointly with the Monks of St. Augustine. Pursuant to this Order, a sort of Synod was held, and Hubert Walters elected, whom the King had strongly recommended.

Two Years after, the same Hubert, being made Legate, convened in the Cathedral of York, a national Synod, where several Canons were made, of which two only deserve Notice. By the IIIrd, Priests are forbidden to take Money for saying Mass. The Vth, expressly prohibits Deacons to administer the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, unless in Cases of Necessity.

COUNCILS in the Reign of King JOHN.

IN the Year 1200, Archbishop Hubert held a national Synod at Westminster, notwithstanding the King's Prohibition, which is remarked by Historians as the first King's Prohibition of this Nature. Several Canons were made in the Synod, the chief of which are these:

The Ist, regulates the Pronunciation of Divine Service, to prevent reading Prayers either too slow, or too fast.

The IIrd, forbids the consecrating the Eucharist more than once in a Day, without urgent Necessity.

The XIth, declares against clandestine Marriages, and forbids married Persons to travel beyond Sea, without publishing their mutual Consent.

In 1206, the Pope intending to levy in England, an extraordinary Romefoot, or Peter-Pence, the Bishops met in a Synod to debate upon his Demand. But the King sending them word to proceed no further, they broke up without coming to any Resolution. And indeed, Peter-Pence, not concerning the Clergy more than the rest of the Nation, it belonged not to them to determine, whether it was to be paid or not. Nevertheless, shortly after, a Legate, one Florentinus, called another Synod at Reading, upon the same Account, and, as if the Clergy had been the occasion of the King's Refusal, extorted from them an Aid, in lieu of the extraordinary Romefoot demanded by the Pope.

I pass over in Silence several Councils, called purely to regulate the Restitution, the King was to make the Ecclesiasticks, after his Reconciliation to the Pope, having spoken of them elsewhere.

During the Reign of King John, Pope Innocent III convened the XIIth Council of Lateran, at which were present four hundred and twelve Bishops (3). Three hundred and seventy Canons, which, according to the Report of the Historians, were not very agreeable to the Prelates, by whose Authority they were made. This gave M. Du Pin occasion to a famous Modern to conjecture, that the Pope drew up these Canons himself, and that they were read before the Council, whose Silence was taken for an Approbation. This was an Artifice, which began to be practised, in order to pass in Councils whatever the Pope desired. The President ordered the Canons ready drawn up to be read, and the Prelates perceiving they were not designed to be debated, none dared to be the first opposer. In process of time, this Expedient was frequently used, and the Council of Vienna which was held in 1312, and where the Order of the Knights-Templars was abolished, will furnish us with a remarkable Instance.

To return to the Council of Lateran, since the Church of England, as a Member of the Catholic Church, was no less concerned than the other Churches in the Canons made there, it will not be perhaps foreign to the purpose to be something particular. But however, to avoid Prolixity, it will be sufficient to take notice of three Canons, which seem remarkable beyond the rest.

The Ist establishes in express Terms, the Doctrine of Transubstantiation.

The IIrd imports, that the secular Powers shall be requested, solicited, and, if need be, compelled by Ecclesiastical Censures, to take an Oath to use their utmost Endeavours to root all Hereticks out of their Territories. That for the future, all Persons, without Exception, shall be obliged to swear the same Oath, upon their being promoted to any Dignity Spiritual or Temporal. And if any Temporal Lord refuses to purge his Dominions of Hereticks, after an Admonition, he shall be excommunicated by the Metropolitan and his Suffragans. And in case he contemns the Censures of the Church, and refuses to make Satisfaction within a Year, the Pope shall declare his Subjects and Vassals absolved from their Oath of Allegiance, and at the same time, shall invade the Catholic Princes to seize his Country, leaving to the Sovereign of the Fee, if there is any, his Rights; upon condition that the said Sovereign shall do nothing to obstruct the Execution of the Canon.

Remark on
Custos.

It is difficult to read this Decree without being surprized, that Bishops should assume a Right to deprive Sovereign Princes of their Dominions, as if in fact Jesus Christ had, in clear and express Terms, invested them with such a Power. They might be allowed a Right to exhort, to request, to solicit Princes to purge their Territories of Heretics. Nay, let them be suffered, if you please, to excommunicate these same Princes, under colour of their being, as Members of the Church, liable to Ecclesiastical Censures, as well as their Subjects. But that Bishops may extend their Authority so far as to decree temporal Punishments, and deprive Princes, or even private Persons of their Property, is what cannot be granted; without resigning to them withal, the temporal Sovereignty of the whole Christian World. To what purpose then, will some say, is Excommunication, if the Persons excommunicated happen to condemn it? I know not; God alone will be Judge in the other Life. But this did not content the Clergy, and much less the Popes, who would be respected, feared and obeyed, in this Life: For that was the sole end of all their Excommunications. And indeed, to this temporal Punishments were absolutely necessary, spiritual ones not producing their Effect, but in the next World, about which they were little concerned. Thanks be to God, the generality of Christians follow at present a different Theology. Accordingly the Excommunications of Princes are much less frequent, because Peoples Eyes are opened, and do not think themselves obliged to renounce their Allegiance to their Sovereigns, in compliance to the Pope's Pleasure. It may be farther observed on this Decree, that, though it seemed to be levelled only against the Earl of Toulouse, and the other Protectors of the Albigenses, yet the Consequences reached all Christian Princes in general. And indeed from this Principle naturally flowed the unlimited Authority, too frequently exerted by the Roman Pontiff.

The last Canon of the Council of Lateran, that I design to consider, is the XIVth. By this Canon it is decreed, that the Priests, who are addicted to Debauchery in Countries where Marriage is allowed, should be more severely punished than those, who live in Places, where they are obliged to Celibacy. Hence it may be inferred, that the Celibacy of the Clergy was not yet universally established.

COUNCILS in the Reign of HENRY III.

I shall not take upon me to speak of all the Councils in the long Reign of Henry III. because they were, for the most part, convened only to supply the Popes with Money, or to countenance their Exactions. I shall content myself with chusing such, as more immediately related to Religion, or where something remarkable was transacted.

In 1222, Cardinal Langton conven'd, in the Cathedral of Canterbury (1), a provincial Synod, where three Men were condemned, and delivered over to the secular Arm. The first pretended himself to be Jesus Christ, and shewed on his Body the five Wounds of our Saviour. The second was a Hermaphrodite, who accompanied that Impostor. The third was a Deacon, who, to marry a Jewish Woman, with whom he was in Love, had circumcised himself (2).

In 1225, the same Prelate held a Synod, where was made a Canon, confirming the Prohibition of the Marriage of the Priests. This leaves room to presume, there were still in England, Priests who stood their Ground against all former Prohibitions.

In 1237, Otho the Pope's Legate convened a national Council at London, in St. Paul's Church. As he knew there was a Design to oppose the Canons which he would have passed against Pluralities, he obtained of the King a Guard of two hundred Men. As soon as the Prelates had taken their places, he ordered certain Canons to be read, which were brought from Rome ready prepared, according to the new Method. When the Canon against Pluralists came to be read, Walter de Cantilupe Bishop of Winchester, and some other Prelates, strenuously opposed it, and even protested against it. This opposition obliged the Legate to declare, that the Canon should be in force only during the time of his Legateship. However, it was no sooner passed upon that Condition, but an Ecclesiastick in the Legate's Retinue, read aloud a Decretal Epistle of the Pope, by which it was ordained that this Canon should be perpetually binding.

The IIId states the Number of the Sacraments, and reckons them Seven (3).

The IIId fixes the Eves of Easter and Whitsunday for the Administration of Baptism, and as some People scrupled to baptize their Children on these Days, their Scruples were condemned.

The XXIIId enjoins the Clergy to live on their Benefices, at least the best part of the year. This Canon was absolutely necessary at that time. As the Pope dispensed with the Residence of the Italians, who possessed a great Number of Benefices in England; if the English had not been obliged to reside, the Churches would have been quite forsaken.

In 1239, was held at London a Council, which flatly refused the Legate, the Money demanded to defray the Expenses of his Legateship.

The next Year, the same Legate assembled another Synod, where he demanded for the Pope, the ninth part of the Revenues of the Clergy, but could not prevail.

All the rest of the Councils, from 1240 to 1264, were only called to demand Money of the Clergy.

During the Barons Wars, were assembled two Councils. The first at Reading, where was confirmed the Appeal brought by the Barons, from the Proceedings of the Legate then at Boulogne. In the second, held at Northampton in 1265, Othobon (4) the Legate excommunicated all Clergymen engaged in the Earl of Leicester's Party.

In 1268 (5), the same Legate convened at St. Paul's a national Council (6), where were published certain Constitutions brought from Rome, some whereof are still part of the Canon-Law of the English Church. As several of these Constitutions tended to lessen the Power and Jurisdiction of the Bishops, strong opposition was made against them; which obliged the Legate to prorogue the Assembly till next Day. He so wisely improved this short Adjournment, that gaining in this Interval, either by Promises or Threats, such as appeared most averse, on the morrow he met with no farther opposition. This was the method of holding Councils in those Days.

The Ist of these Constitutions allows Laymen to administer Baptism in case of Necessity.

The IIId forbids Priests to take Money for administering the Sacraments, and prescribes these Words to be made use of in giving Absolution: I absolve thee from all thy Sins; or, By the Authority committed unto me, I absolve thee, &c. Hence it may be inferred, that there were still some Priests, who made a Scruple to pronounce the Absolution in a direct manner, and were contented with a bare Declaration.

The IXth enjoins Residence to Clergymen (7).

The XIIIth confirms the Privilege of Sanctuary to Churches.

The XIVth ordains the solemnizing of Marriage in Publick.

The XXth is against those that pretend to give a Compensation, in lieu of the Penance enjoined them.

cont. This Custom, which was become much in vogue, and its Original to the Persecutions to which the Church was exposed, whilst the Northern Nations were over-running the Western Empire. When by the Fury of the Wars, the Priests and Bishops themselves were forced to fly, the principal Prelates of the Province appointed Priests to officiate in the vacant Benefices, till the Pastor could resume the Care of his Flock. This Custom, at length was abused in a manner very prejudicial to the Church. After Peace was restored, such Priests as were not the true Pastors, and were filled Commendatories, were however continued in the Benefices. For this reason several Councils endeavoured to reform this Abuse, by decreeing, that those who held Benefices in Commendam should not receive the Profits, or officiate as Pastors above six Months. But the Popes, pretending to be above the Canons, continued to dispose of Benefices in Commendam for Term of Life.

The XXXII^d Canon decrees, that before a Bishop was consecrated, strict Enquiry should be made, Whether he held more Livings than one, without a Dispensation, and Whether the Dispensation was authentic and in Form?

The XXXIVth declares void all previous Contracts between Patrons and Persons presented to Benefices.

These are the principal Councils held in England, from the beginning of the Reign of Henry II, to the end of that of Henry III, that is, during the Space of six-score Years. After having observed the manner of making the Canons, it will be necessary to add another Remark on that Subject. It happened very often, that in order to get a Canon passed, which was like to meet with strong opposition, it was inserted, among many others of great use. This was done, that the opposers might be accused of being against Regulations of known usefulness. This Artifice was not only practised in Councils but likewise in Parliaments, when to pass certain Bills, others of absolute Necessity were tacked to them. However, this practice has met from time to time with such strong opposition, that it has not been able hitherto to grow into Custom.

What we have observed in some of these Councils, concerning the Celibacy of the Clergy, is a clear Evidence, that it was not yet universally established, though it is pretended that Aselm accomplished it in the Reign of Henry I. This Evidence may be farther supported by Facts. Long after Aselm, Richard, a Bishop of Lichfield, was Son of Robert Bishop of Chester; upon which an Historian remarks, that in those Days, the being Son to a Priest was no obstacle to Promotions in the Church. The same Historian relates, That the Pope complaining, that the Bishop elect of El was not come to Rome for his Confirmation, the English Ambassador merrily replied, the Prelate had a very lawful Excuse, taken from the Holy Scriptures, for he had just married a Wife. We see also in Barnard's Annals, that a Legate sent by Pope Innocent III, into Poland to establish the Celibacy of the Clergy, did at last carry his Point; but attempting to do the same thing in Bohemia, was in danger of his Life.

There was another Article, of no less Importance to the Popes, and which they pushed as vigorously as that of Celibacy. This was to give to their Ordinances or Decretals, the same Authority as to the Canons of the Councils. In 1150, one Gratian published a Collection of Decretals, containing all the Ordinances made by the Popes to that Time, that it might serve for a Rule in the Administration of Ecclesiastical Justice. To this Collection were added, in time, several Decrees made afterwards, in order to compose a complete Body of the Canon Law. Raymond de Pegusford, Penitentiary to Gregory IX, was ordered to make this Collection, intitled, The second Part of the Canon-Law, and published in 1230. He annexed to it some Constitutions of the Councils, and Resolutions of the Doctors, since the Year 1250, where the second Part began. This last Collection was not only a Supplement to the old Canon-Law, but even altered it in several Articles. For Instance, it is determined, that Bishops should not be capable of Ecclesiastical Preferments, without the Pope's Dispensation. By this Addition, without the Pope's Dispensation, the Court of Rome assumed indirectly, the Power of favouring Bishops, when she thought proper, contrary to the ancient Constitutions of the Councils. That Court could never have a better opportunity to publish the Decretals, since her Power was now at the utmost Height. There was neither Subject nor Prince that dared to oppose the Will of the Pope, when they spoke with an absolute Tone. And therefore, without finding much Resistance, they enact as a Law, whatever they were pleased to decree, even though directly contrary to the Laws, which till then were in force. For example, as to the case of Bastards, the Laws of England, reckoned, as illegitimate, Children born before Marriage, notwithstanding their Fathers and Mothers were afterwards married; but the Canon-Law decreed the contrary; on which there were great Contentions in the Parliament of Merton in 1236 (1).

The Roman Pontiffs were no sooner become almost absolute Monarchs in the Church, but great Numbers of Religious Orders sprang up, which were as a Standing Army, to support the Grandeur and Power of the Popes. The Council of Lateran, endeavoured to prevent this Abuse, by expressly forbidding the Institution of any new Order of Monks. But this did not hinder Dominic de Guzman a Spaniard, who long preached against the Albigenses, from forming the Project of a new Order, under the Name of Predicator Friars, of which he petitioned for Pope Innocent's Confirmation. The Pope, on account of the Prohibition of the Lateran Council, made some Scruple at first to consent to this Establishment: But if we may believe the Historians of this Order, he was told, by a heavenly Vision, that he could do nothing more serviceable to the Church. However, it was Honorius his Successor, that confirmed this new Order, by the Name of Predicator Friars, because the Design of their Institution, was to preach against Heretics. They were likewise called Dominicans, from their Founder, and in France, Jacobins, from their first Settlement in St. James's Street in Paris. The Court of the Inquisition was committed to the Dominicans, which made them famous for their Cruelties upon the pretended Heretics, of whom that Court is Judge. They settled in England in 1217, shortly after their Institution.

The Order of Franciscans, founded by Francis de Franciscano, Affisi, quickly followed that of the Dominicans. Innocent III, approved of it in 1215, but did not authentically confirm it. It was Honorius III, that established it by a Bull in 1223, and the next Year this Order settled in England. The Religious, who embraced this Rule, took, out of Modesty, the Name of Minors, or Minorites, and though, in time, they were divided into several Societies, they all acknowledged Francis d'Affisi for their Head and Founder. By their Rule, they were not to preach, or take Confessions in any Diocese, without express leave from the Bishop. But this Article was not long observed by them. They represented to the Pope, that Christians were ashamed to confess themselves to their own Pastors. That many scrupled to do it, because the Parish-Priests themselves were guilty, of the Sins confessed to them. In fine, that they had not the Discretion to be secret. Upon this Foundation, they petitioned, for this part of their Rule, a Dispensation, which was readily granted them.

These two Orders of Dominicans and Franciscans, acquired so great a Character for Holiness among the People, that there were but few Persons, that had not one of these Friars for Director. Consequently, the Alms they received were very considerable. They had moreover another Advantage, in that, for a long Space, almost all the Popes were chosen out of one or other of these Orders. So that, by their credit at the Court of Rome, they obtained very often Grants of what belonged to other Orders, under colour that it was necessary for their Subsistence. On the other hand, they heaped up immense Riches, as well by the voluntary Gifts of the Living, as by the Legacies and Grants extorted from the Dying, by making them believe, nothing could contribute more to their eternal Salvation. Mean time, as these two Orders laboured with equal Ardour to ingross the Benefactions of the Devout, and thereby became Rivals to one another, a Jealousy arose between them, which was soon followed by a most scandalous Quarrel, which was not easily ended.

In a Council at Rebister, in 1244, a new Order of Cross-Bearers, appeared and demanded leave to settle in England. These produced a Bull from the Pope, forbidding all Persons to reproach them, and empowering them to excommunicate those, that should dare to violate this Privilege. The Synod not thinking proper to grant their Petition, they were sent away, on pretence, that the licensing them was a direct Breach upon the Canons of the late Council of Lateran.

1. In the Statute of Merton, Chap. IX. it is declared, That whoever is born before Marriage is a Bastard. Upon this the Bishops replied, That it was contrary to the Canons of the Church, and were very angry with it. A Baron, to content that such as were born before, should be legitimated as well as those born after Marriage, the Church having decreed it so. But the Barons with one Voice answered, That they would not consent that the Laws of the Kingdom should be changed.

I shall close this Abstract of the State of the Church, with some Remarks, on the celebrated Ecclesiasticks of those Days.

Johannes Sarisburienſis Native, and not Bishop, of Salisbury, as some have affirmed, was one of the Ornaments of the Church of England, for Learning, Politeness, and Regularity of Life. He was very intimate with Athelstan IV. who died to complain to him of the Weight of the Papal Crown. However the Bull, which this Pope granted Henry II with, on account of the Conquest of Ireland, seems to show, he was not the most scrupulous. John de Salisbury, who adhered to Thomas Becket, and followed him into France, procured by his means, the Bishoprick of Chartres. He wrote the Polyticon, or de Nugis Curialium; a Collection of Letters; and several other inconsiderable Tracts. He died in 1181, or 1182.

I shall say nothing here of Thomas Becket, or of Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, having sufficiently spoken of them elsewhere (1).

Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, who attended Richard to the Holy-Land, where he died, passed for a good Divine. Some of his Works, still extant, show this Reputation not to be groundless. His great Contest with the Monks of St. Augustin, who were grown very insolent, put him upon founding a Society of Regular Canons (2), near Canterbury (3), with design to transfer to them by degrees the Privileges of the Monastery of St. Augustin. But the Monks, having early knowledge of his Intent, made such an Interest at the Court of Rome, that the Archbishop was forced to desist from his Project.

Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, a Native of Grenoble, was one of the most illustrious Prelates of the Church of England, in the Reigns of Richard I. and King John. His Virtue gained him great Reverence from the People of his Diocese, who were terribly afraid of being excommunicated by him, because they observed, as they imagined, that those who lay under his Censures, seldom failed of being visited with some worldly Calamity. It is related, as an Instance of his Zeal and Resolution, that by his own Authority, he ordered to be removed out of the Church of Godstow in Oxfordshire, the Tomb of Rosamund, Mistress to Henry II.; which stood in the middle of the Quire (4), hung with black Velvet, and Wax Tapers about it. Though he was told, the Tomb was placed there by the King's Order, he thought it ought not to be suffered, saying, it was a shameful thing, that the Tomb of such a Woman, should stand in so honorable a Place. This Bishop dying with the Reputation of a Saint, was canonized by Honorius III. in 1221.

In the midst of King John's Contest with the Pope, one Alexander Castermaris a Clergyman, who had been Professor of Divinity at the University of Paris, publicly preached, that the Pope had not Power to deprive Kings of their Crown. This Freedom drew on him the Indignation of the Court of Rome, who reduced him at length to the Necessity of begging his Bread from Door to Door. Matthew Paris, stoutly inveighs against the Errors of this Doctor, though no one seemed more convinced than this Historian of the Pope's Abuse of his Power, as he has plainly demonstrated in his History.

Walter de Gray, Archbishop of York, was more famous as a Statesman, than as a Bishop. His Successors were enriched by his Bounty in purchasing the Manor of Torbay, and annexing it to his See. He built likewise at London, a stately Palace, which went by the Name of York-Place; but was afterwards called White-Hall (5). Unfortunately, this House which was for many Years a Palace-Royal, was some time since burnt down to the Ground.

Edmund, who, from a Canon of Salisbury, was promoted to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury, after the Pope had annulled three Elections to make room for him, was very commendable for his Moderation and regular Life (6). He would have been glad to see the Pope's Power, which was then at the height, reduced within due Bounds. But perceiving, as Matters stood, such an Attempt must have proved unsuccessful; he chose rather to give way to the Torrent, than withstand so formidable a Power, supported moreover by the King's Authority. However, to avoid the Blame of a base Compliance, he retired into France, to the Monastery of Pontigny, where his Austerities shortened his Days. He was canonized by Pope Innocent IV. in 1216.

Richard Poor, Bishop of Salisbury (7), and afterwards of Darham, is remarkable upon two Accounts. Whilst he was Bishop of Salisbury, he persuaded the Inhabitants, to remove to a more advantageous Situation, where Salisbury now stands. Here he laid the Foundation of a stately Church, which was not finished till thirty Years after, and remains to this Day. The second thing which rendered this Prelate famous was, his Synodical Constitutions, for the use of the Church of Salisbury. They are in all eighty seven, of which I shall mention only the XVth, which forbids the Priests to take Money for saying Mass, and the XXXIVth, whereby it plainly appears, that the Laity communicated at that time in both Kinds.

Alexander Hales, born in Gloucestershire, a great Canonist, and styled the Irrefragable Doctor, was Professor of Divinity in the University of Paris. Among his other Works, he composed short Notes on the whole Bible, and a Commentary [in four Books] upon the Alphabet of the Sentences; where, as the learned Du Pin observes, he discovers more Skill in Logic and Metaphysics than in the Antiquities of the Church.

Seuall, Archbishop of York, was an able Divine, and of an unblemished Life. He took Pattern by Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, his Master. He was so angry at the frequent Exactions of the Court of Rome, that he could not forbear writing a sharp Remonstrance to Pope Alexander IV. upon that Subject. Amongst other things, he told him, when Jesus Christ commissioned St. Peter to feed his Sheep, he did not give him Authority to flea them. This Freedom, with his Refusal to admit certain Italians, who came with Provisions from the Court of Rome, drew on him the Displeasure of Alexander, who at length excommunicated him. The Archbishop upon his Death bed, complained bitterly of the Pope's Injustice, appealing to Heaven. Matthew Paris doubts, did not believe, this Excommunication deprived Seuall of eternal Salvation, since he affirms, this Prelate wrought a Miracle in his last Sickness.

Robert Kilwarby, Archbishop of Canterbury, was a very learned Prelate, for the Age he lived in. His Merit raising him to the Dignity of Cardinal, he resigned his Archbishoprick to live at Rome.

I shall conclude what I have to say, concerning the most noted Ecclesiasticks of those Days, with an Account of one of the most eminent, I mean, Groftest Bishop of Lincoln. As there are several curious Particulars about him, I shall speak more fully of him, than of the rest.

Groftest was a Prelate of Resolution and Courage, neither to be gained by Court-Favours, nor frightened by the Pope's Menaces; Rocks which few Ecclesiasticks, in those Days, knew how to avoid. He, being wholly intent upon following, what appeared to him reasonable and just, without being swayed by any consideration, little regarded the Circumstances of the Times, or the Quality of Persons; and opposed equally, the King's Will, and the Pope's Pleasure, according as it happened. By this Steadiness, he acquired a great Reputation among the People, long accustomed to see the Bishops stoop to the King or the Pope. It chanced one Day, that he excommunicated the Sheriff, for refusing to imprison an excommunicated Person (8). He contemned the Church's Censures. Henry III. very angry with the Bishop, for not applying to him, to oblige the Sheriff, to execute the Canons, addressed the Pope, to secure his Authority; a Remedy worse than the Disease.

This Affair obliged Groftest to take a Journey to Rome, where he was confirmed in his ill Opinion of the Court of Rome. He could not see without Indignation, and Concern, the best Preferments in the Kingdom bestowed on Italians, who neither resided on their Benefices, nor understood a Word of English. His Grief to behold the Church's Revenues, devoured by these Harpies, causing him to refuse to institute an Italian to one of the best Livings of his Diocese, he was presently after suspended. But, regardless of this Censure, he continued his Episcopal Functions, his Flock being no more scrupulous than himself. He even refused, at that very time, to admit of new Provisions from the Pope in favour of other Italians. He declared, that to entrust the Cure of Souls to such Pastors, was to act in the Name of the Devil rather than by the Authority of God.

The Court of Rome was unwilling then to make any Noise, for fear of turning against her the whole Clergy of England, from whom she reaped a plentiful Harvest. For this reason, the Pope thought it best to connive at the Disobedience of this Prelate, who was of known Resolution, and in great Repute with the People. He chose rather to try to win him by fair means, in giving him a Testimony of his Esteem, by a Commission to reform certain Abuses crept into the Monasteries. Notwithstanding this, Grosset soon after touched the Pope in a very sensible Manner, by computing the yearly Sums drawn by the benefited Italians out of England, as was said in another Place. Innocent IV sat then in the Papal Chair. He had been so used to treat the English with Haughtiness, that he could not bear of the Bishop's Proceedings, without being extremely provoked. But as he durst not attack him upon that score, because, what he had done, was universally approved, he fell upon him, for refusing to admit his Provisions, and sent him a menacing Letter, which would have frightened any but him. Grosset returned the Person, that was ordered to send him the Letter with certain Instructions (1), a very bold Answer, of which, the Reader will not be dispensed to see the following Extract.

"I desire your Prudence to take notice, that I am always ready to obey the Apostolical Instructions, and declare my self an Enemy to whatever is repugnant thereto. For to both these things, I am bound by the Command of God. To apply this: The Apostolical Instruction (2), must of necessity be agreeable to the Doctrine of the Apostles, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who is principally represented by the Pope. Since Jesus Christ has declared, he that is not with me is against me, the Sanctity of the Apostolical See, is such, that it can never appear in opposition to our Lord. From hence it plainly follows, that the Letter in Question (3), is directly opposite to an Apostolical Character. First, because of the Clause Non-obstante, so frequently made use of now-a-days, which has nothing of natural Equity in it. On the contrary, it is certain, it introduces a Deluge of Mischiefs, as it gives occasion to a great deal of Inconstancy and Breach of Faith. It shakes the Foundations of mutual Trust, and makes Language and Writings of no Force or Significance. In fine, it cannot be, but that the Purity of Religion, and the Peace of Society, must suffer extremely, by such a stretch of Apostolical Authority. In the second Place, next to the Sins of Lucifer and Antichrist, there cannot be a greater Defection, or which carries with it a more direct opposition to the Doctrine of our Saviour and his Apostles, than to destroy Souls, by depriving them of the pastoral Office. And yet it is evident, that those are guilty of this Sin, who undertake the sacerdotal Function, and receive the Profits, without discharging the Duty. For in the Scripture-Account, the Pastor, who neglects his Flock, is a downright Murderer of the Sheep. Can one help therefore considering, as a most flagrant Crime, a Conduct, which tends so strongly to the Destruction of Truth and Virtue, and the Happiness of Mankind? If in moral Productions the Cause of Good is better than the Effect, it is just the contrary in the Propagation of Vice, the Source and Original whereof, are worse than the Disorder, that flows from them. It is manifest therefore, that those, who bring such unqualified Persons into the Church, and by that means destroy the Hierarchy, are most to blame; and their Crime rises in Proportion, to the Height of their Station. From hence I conclude, that the Apostolical See, which has received so full an Authority from our Saviour, for Edification, and not for Destruction, ought not to countenance, much less to command, so horrid and pernicious a Prevarication. To attempt any thing of this kind, would be a notorious Abuse, if not a Forfeiture of her Authority. It would be in effect, to stray at a vast Distance from the Throne of Glory, and to represent in a very ill manner the Person of our Saviour. Such Persons may be said rather to be placed in the Chair of Pestilence, and to sit upon the Bench, with the Devil and Antichrist. Neither can any Christian, who desires to continue in the Communion of the Church, and pays a due Regard to the Apostolical See, obey any commands of this kind, though imposed by an Angel from Heaven. On the contrary, he ought to rebel, if I may call it so, against the Order, and oppose it to the utmost of his Power. For this Reason, since the Instructions above-mentioned, are so plain a Contradiction to the Catholick Faith, and the Sanctity of the Apostolical See, my Duty obliges me to refuse them, and not to comply out of Deference to the Person, by whom they are sent. Neither can your Prudence justly put any hardship upon me, because, properly speaking, my Refusal ought not to be looked upon as a Contumacy, but rather as a filial Respect. For, to sum up all in a word, the Apostolical See, has its Commission only for Edification, and not for Destruction, and the Plenitude of its Power, ought not to extend beyond, what relates to Edification. But these Provisions, as they are called, have a manifest Tendency to Destruction. Therefore the Holy See, can by no means allow, such a Liberty: For to conclude; these Practices are revealed by Light and Blad, which cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and not by the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

This Letter put Innocent into a terrible Rage. What! he says he, has this old Datard, the Confidence to censure my Conduct! By St. Peter and St. Paul, I will make him such an Example, that the World shall stand amazed at his Punishment (4). His Passion, however, was somewhat moderated by the Cardinals, who represented to him the ill Consequences of too great a Severity. That the Noise he should make on this occasion, would be prejudicial to the Holy See, since it would infallibly cause the English to examine the Motives. That there was danger, that, as they stood affected to the Holy See, and to the Bishop of Lincoln, they would think it very strange, that a Prelate of so established a Reputation, should be treated with such Rigour. That on the contrary, there was a Necessity of carefully avoiding the giving occasion, to enter into the Examination of what he alleged, to justify his Non-compliance; and therefore, upon all these Accounts, it was most advisable to take no notice at all of this insolent Letter. Though these Remonstrances moderated the Effects of the Pope's Fury, they were not however sufficient to appease him entirely. The Annals of Laner-Ang. Sec. before his Death, the Bishop was excommunicated a little p. 341.
appealed to the Court of Heaven. This is farther confirmed by the Report of several Historians, who say, that Innocent moved in the Conclave, that the Body of Grosset should be taken up and buried in the High-way, but that the Cardinals consented not to it. Be this as it will, if he was excommunicated, he minded it not, but continued to discharge his Functions; neither were the Clergy of his Diocese more scrupulous than their Bishop, and obeyed him till the Day of his Death. The Bishops his Brethren, and the Monks themselves, though great Sticklers to the Pope, were not more apt to believe, this Excommunication had produced any great Effect. Some, who were present at his Death, affirmed, they were entertained with divine Music in the Air over the House where he died. We find likewise that in the Pontificate of Clement V, the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul, petitioned very earnestly for the Canonization of Grosset, on account of several Miracles wrought by him after his Death. But as he was not of that sort of Saints, wherewith the Court of Rome filled the Calendar, their Petition was rejected. An Instance of a Bishop dying under the Sentence of Excommunication, and yet passing for a Saint in the Country where he lived, is a Difficulty which must be left to be cleared by those whom it concerns. I shall only relate one Circumstance more, which, if not true, is, at least, a Proof of the great Opinion of this Prelate's Sanctity. An Historian reports, that Grosst, a little after his Death, appeared in his Robes to Innocent IV, and striking him on the Side with his Crozier, gave him a severe Reprimand. He adds, that the Pope was so frightened at this Apparition, that he continued two Days without eating. I have nothing to say concerning the Truth of this Relation, but draw this Inference from it, that though the Bishop died excommunicated by the Pope, and in Sentiments very opposite to those of the Court of Rome, the Historian for all that testified by this

Grosst (1) wrote several Tracts. Amongst other Performances he translated from the Greek into Latin, The Testament of the twelve Patriarchs, a Copy of which M. Paris, one John de Basingstoke, who met with it at Athens, put into his hands. As to the time when the Original was written, it is uncertain. Dr. Cave alligns it to the latter End of the second Century. Dedwell places it in the first, and some others believe it was composed by some Jew before our Saviour's Death (2).

(1) He was born at Stadbrooke in Suffolk; and died October 8. 1253. M. Paris, p. 876.

(2) As to the Historians who lived in these four Reigns, the most noted are:

SIMON OF DURHAM, a Monk and Precentor of the Church of Durham, in the Year 1164, one of the most learned Men of his Age. He wrote, besides other things, two books, de Gestis Regum, which are not his Master-pieces, being only a few indigested Collections, chiefly out of Florus of Worcester, whose very Words he frequently copies. He began where Bede left off, and goes as far as the 29th of Henry I, 1129. He is one of the X Scriptores, published 1652 at London.

HENRY Archdeacon of Huntingdon, flourished about the same time; whose eight Books, concluding with the Reign of King Stephen, were published by Sir Henry Spall. He is a Follower of Bede, and has borrowed a great many Lies from Jeffrey of Monmouth. He writes concisely, and reduces the Transactions of the History to the several Reigns of the High-Saxon Kings, but has not adjusted them so well as he ought to have done.

WILLIAM of NEWBURGH, so called from a Monastery in Yorkshire, whereof he was Member. His History begins at the Conquest, and ends at the Year 1197. He was a violent Persecutor of Jeffrey of Monmouth. His Latin Style is preferred to that of Matt. Paris, and equalled with those of Eadmer and Malsburg by Dr. Watt.

OSBERT, a Monk of Canterbury, wrote a Chronicle of the Reigns of Stephen, Henry II, and Richard I, with Judgment enough, says Bishop Nichols. It was published among the X Scriptores. Lond. 1652.

ROGER DE HOUEDEN, Chaplain some time to Henry II. He is charged with borrowing from Simon of Durham, without acknowledging it, but, as Bishop Nichols observes, if he did, he has improved his Story, adding Years to many things confusedly related in that Author. There are in his Book many Letters, Speeches, &c. relating to Ecclesiastical Matters. He was Contemporary with Grosst, 1201. His History was published by Sir Henry Savil. Francf 1601.

RAIHF DE DICETO, Dean of London. He wrote about the Year 1210. His Abbreviations Chronicon contain an Abstract of our History down to the Conquest; and his Imagines Historiarum give the Portraiture of some of our Kings more at length, ending with the first Years of King John's Reign. Mr. Selden praises this Author and his Works, though Bishop Nichols says, he usually copied verbatim out of other Writers. He is among the X Scriptores.

WALTER, a Monk of Coventry, a clear and faithful Writer. He lived in Coventry in 1217. He has some few things of Note not to be met with in Jeffrey of Monmouth, Houedon, and Huntingdon, in his three Books of Chronicles, which are chiefly Collections from the said Authors.

MATTHEW OF PARIS, a Monk of St. Albans, one of the most renowned Historians of this Kingdom. His Historia Major contains the Annals at large of eight of our Kings, from William the Conqueror to Henry III. It was first published at London 1571, and reprinted with Additions of various Readings, &c. by Dr. Warr, London 1640, and since in 1684. From the Year 1259, wherein Matt. Paris died, to Henry III's Death, it was continued by William Rishanger, a Monk of the same Fraternity. The whole Work manifests a great deal of Candour and Exactness in the Author, who tells us, so particularly of the brave Repulses given by many of our Princes to the Usurpations of the Roman See, that it is a Wonder how such an Heretical History came to survive thus long. A late Copy of this History, supposed to be written by the Author's own Hand, is in the King's Library at St. James's. He wrote an Abstract of his History, which Lambard styles his Historia Minor, having in it several Particulars of Note omitted in his Historia Major. It is pretended, that Paris had but a small Hand in the whole History, having begun only at the Year 1135, the rest being done to his Hand by one Roger de Wendover, or Wingor, (or de Wendover Prior de Bulwair, as it is in the MS Copy in Cotton's Library) one of his Predecessors in the same Monastery.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK IX.

The Reigns of EDWARD I. and EDWARD II.; Containing, the Space of Thirty Five Years.

9. EDWARD I. (1) Surnamed LONGSHANKS.

THE Death of Henry III, happening during the Absence of his Son Edward, who was to succeed him, seemed to offer the Malecontents a favorable Opportunity to raise new Troubles. However it was not attended with any ill Consequence. Leicester's Party was so humbled, that they were no longer able to look up. And though some restless Persons had made use of this Juncture, to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, the Nation's good Opinion of Edward, would have rendered their Projects impracticable. This Prince shined with great Lustre, during the latter Part of his Father's Reign. The Victory of Evesham, the Reduction of the Ely Rebels, and his Clemency to them when reduced, were still fresh in the Memory of the English, and filled them with Esteem and Admiration for his rare Qualities. They did not doubt but he would employ all his Talents, to restore the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom, which had received such violent Shocks in the two foregoing Reigns. So that, far from being inclined to favour the Malecontents, they showed an extreme Impatience to see their new Sovereign, building on him alone all the hopes of their future Happiness. Though Edward was absent, and not even heard of, all the Barons with one accord swore Fealty to him (2). At the same time they writ him a very respectful and submissive Letter, inviting him to come with all Speed, and take possession of the Throne of his Ancestors. Mean while, they assembled at London (3), to commit the Regency of the Kingdom to such as should be deemed the most capable. Their Choice falling upon the Archbishop of York, and the Earls of Cornwall and Chester (4), the Parliament, which met quickly after (5), confirmed all the measures taken for the Preservation of the Peace of the Kingdom (6).

This Parliament was composed not only of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, but also of the Knights of the Shires, and Representatives of the principal Cities and Burroughs (7). The same thing was practised under the Government of the Earl of Leicester, during the late King's Captivity. But these Assemblies were not convened by a lawful Authority. I shall not stay to examine whether, before the Time I am now speaking of, the Commons had a Right to send Representatives to Parliament. This is a Point full of Difficulties, and not yet thoroughly cleared. I shall only say, it can't be denied, that they enjoyed this Privilege in the Reign of Edward I, and from thence forward to this Day, have preserved it without Interruption.

Edward pursuing his Voyage without knowing what passed in England, lately arrived in Sicily; where he was received by Charles of Anjou with all the Respect due to 1275. Charters were called. The Statutes of Westminster.

When the Parliament broke up, the King seriously thought of the War, which he was resolved to carry into Wales, to punish the Disobedience of Llewellyn. Whilst he was making Preparations, some Brigist Men happened to take a Vessel, in which was one of the Daughters of the late Earl of Leicester, who was going to Llewellyn, to whom the was conducted. The Prince demanded his Wife, and the King refusing to send her, he perceived he was to expect a War. And indeed as soon as Edward had taken all his Measures, he convened the Peers of the Realm (2), who passed Judgment upon Llewellyn, declaring him guilty of Felony; upon which the War was proclaimed (3). Llewellyn was then sorry, he had pushed Matters so far. To divert the impending Storm he humbly sued for Peace, and withal, intreated the King to restore him his Wife. Both his Requests were denied, unless he would bind himself, to repair all the Damages done to the Borders of England, during the late Wars; a Condition, which he would not accept. The War therefore was begun, but was not very vigorously pursued the first Campaign (4).

In the beginning of the next Spring, Edward assembling a great number of Forces, put himself at the Head of his Army, and marched into the Enemies Country. He caused there a very large way to be cut through a vast Forest, opening by that means a Passage to the very Center of Wales. Before he proceeded, he built the Castles of Flint, and Rhuddlan (5), which secured him an entrance at all Times, and a Retreat in Case of Necessity. As the Welsh were not able to withstand him, he advanced further, and drove them to the Mountain of Snawdon, their usual Refuge, when pursued by the English. At the same time his Fleet attacked the Isle of Anglesey, which made but a faint Resistance.

Llewellyn finding himself unable to oppose so formidable an Enemy, was obliged himself to sue for Peace, which was granted but on very hard Terms. He was forced to promise to pay fifty thousand Pounds sterling, for the Expenses of the War. Moreover Edward, restoring to him the Isle of Anglesey, it was agreed, that, for the future, he should hold it of the Crown of England, paying yearly a thousand Marks. He promised likewise to give entire Satisfaction to his Brother David, who had fled for Refuge to the King, and delivered Hostages for the Performance of his Word. The Haughtiness of the Prince of Wales, being tamed by so mortifying a Treaty, Edward was contented for once with the Honour of the Victory. He generously restored the Hostages, and forgave him the Sums he was bound to pay. However, he caused a Grant of the Isle of Anglesey to be made to him, which nevertheless he was not to enjoy, unless Llewellyn died without Heirs. Then he delivered up the betrothed Lady, and did him the Honour to assist at his Nuptials. He created also David, Brother of Llewellyn, Earl of Denbigh, and to attach him to the Interests of England, gave him to Wife a rich English Heiress. (6).

The happy Issue of the War with Wales was immediately followed by Edward's Acquisition in France, of the Earldom of Ponthieu and Montreuil, fallen to his Queen, by the Death of her Mother, Queen of Castile, who was in possession. But to obtain of the King of France the Investiture of that Fief, he was obliged to confirm the King his Father's Treaty, made whilst a Captive to the Earl of Leicester, and to renounce, like him, all Claim to Anjou and Normandy. He referred however the yearly Rent of thirty Pounds out of the Revenues of Normandy, apparently as an Acknowledgment that it once belonged to his Ancestors.

This Affair being ended, Edward seriously set about rectifying the Coin, which was very much altered and adulterated, during the Troubles of the late Reign. Upon Information that the Jews were the chief Authors of this Mischief, he caused all that were in the Kingdom to be seized in one Day, to escape. Then, after a full and eighty (8), convicted, and executed without

An Affair of another to the Publick, furnished to show his Power, reduced into the King's Riches of the Crown a Subject of Contention, therto to find an end to something so prejudicial to the Crown, exacted from King John the Charter, which had taken care to insert a Clause, expressing Perons to alienate their Lands to the Church, Prohibition, as well as several others, had not been observed. The Complaints upon this head were renewed in the beginning of this Reign, wherein every one thought he had reason to hope all Grievances would be redressed. It was demonstrated to the King, that in process of time, all the Lands would be in the hands of the Clergy, if People were still suffered to alienate their Estates to the Church. And indeed, the Church never dying, always acquiring and never alienating, it could not be but that her Riches should increase immensely, and in the end all the Lands of the Kingdom would be in her Hands. Edward having maturely considered this Affair, summoned the Parliament (9), and proposed the making a Law to reform this Abuse. The Proposal was received with Joy, and a Statute was made, whereby all Perons were forbid to dispose of their Estates to Societies, which never die, without the King's expresse Consent. This Statute was called the Statute of Mortmain, because it was intended to prevent Estates from falling into dead Hands, that is, Hands of no Service to the King and the Publick, without hopes of their ever changing their Owners.

The Parliament which met the next Year (10), being desirous to redress another Abuse, unadvisedly gave birth to a Greater. During the Troubles of the two late Reigns, several Perons appropriated to themselves Lands, which belonged not to them. The Crown it self was a Sufferer by this disorder. To remedy this Evil, and give every one his own, the Parliament passed an Act, in it self very just. It imported, that all who were in possession of the contested Estates, should be obliged to show how they acquired them, and produce their Title before the Judges, in order to be examined. This Statute from the English Word Warrant, was filed Quo Warranto, as much as to say, an Act which serves for Foundation or Security of the Possession (11). So that the Quo Warranto, is properly a Right to demand of any Person, by what Warrant, or Title, he holds the Estate in dispute. This Regulation was just and necessary: But the King, misled by ill Advice, and a Desire of amassing Money, made use of it, contrary to the Design of the Parliament, to oppress his Subjects. As he was sensible, that among the great Numbers, who held their Lands of the Crown, it could not be but that many had lost their Titles, he was resolved to take Advantage of their Misfortune, under Colour of putting the Statute of Quo Warranto in Execution. To that end, he published a Proclamation, enjoining all Perons that held Lands of the Crown, to lay their Titles before the Judges of the Realm. This Proclamation was looked upon as the Source of a very great Grievance. And indeed, those that were first attacked, and could not produce their original Titles, though they proved a long Possession, were forced to pay large Sums to the King, to preserve their Estates. This Grievance would have gone much further, had not a Stop been put to it by the Courage of the Earl of Hereford. The Earl appearing before the Judges, was required to show the fundamental Title, by virtue whereof he held his Lands. He answered, by drawing an old rusty 1283; of the Law authorized a Sentence of Death, was it not very barbarous to execute a Prince of a Royal Family, in a manner till then unusual with regard to Persons of distinguished Birth? What would not these same Historians have said, if a King of France, after taking in Fight, a Brother of the King of England, had ordered him to be ignominiously hung on a Gibbet? Or if, finding the Body of the King himself slain in Battle, had caused his Head to be placed on the Walls of the Bastile?

After thus securing the possession of the Principality of Wales, Edward sought means to prevent all Accidents, that might occasion its Loss. The annexing that Country to the Crown of England, was what seemed most proper to that end. Accordingly, he summoned a Parliament, where it was resolved, that Wales should be inseparably united to the Crown. Thus the Welsh, those small Remains of the ancient Britons, lost at length their Liberty, after preserving it in that little Corner of the Island, above eight hundred Years. Surely, they cannot, without Injustice, be denied the Commendations due to the Resolution, wherewith they had hitherto defended their Country. Destitute of all Succours, without foreign Alliances, and without a naval Power, they had stood their Ground against the Kings of England, Saxons and Normans, who had almost all attempted to subdue them with Forces vastly superior. It is true, they were often obliged to pay Tribute to the English Monarchs: But however, they remained all along a distinct Nation, governed by their own Laws. It was not by their Valour alone, that they preserved their Liberty, but also by their Policy, in dexterously fomenting the Diffentions of their Neighbours, 'till at last, the time appointed for their losing that most valuable Blessing, happened in the Reign of Edward I. It may, however, be said, that if Amends can be made for such a Loss, they had reason to be easy, since they became one and the same Nation with their Conquerors. From that time they have all along enjoyed the same Laws and Privileges, which render the People of England the happiest Nation under the Sun (1).

The Satisfaction Edward received from the Conquest of Wales, was immediately followed by a great Affliction, caused by the Death of Alphonso his Son (2). He was a Prince of great Hopes, and being now twelve Years of Age, was going to marry the only Daughter of Florence Earl of Holland. This was the third Son Edward lost within the Space of three Years. John his eldest Son died before his return from the Holy-Land. Henry his second, was contracted to the only Daughter of Theobald King of Navarre (3).

Though the Welsh were entirely subdued, they failed not to snew, on all occasions, their extreme regret to see themselves subject to the English. Some of them had even the Boldness to tell the King, he should never peaceably enjoy their Country, as long as they were not governed by a Prince of their own Nation. If we may believe certain Historians, this bold Declaration induced the King to give them some sort of Satisfaction. They pretend from that Moment, he proposed to give them for Prince, the Son whom he hoped his Queen, then with Child, would shortly bring into World. They add, with this View, he would have her go and lie-in at Caernarvon, a Town in Wales, where, according to his Expectation, she was brought to bed of a Prince (4), called Edward, and situated of Caernarvon, the place of his Birth. It is said further, that immediately after the Queen's Delivery, he convened the States of Wales, and declared to them his Resolution, to give them a Prince born in their Country, and who could not speak a word of English: Then he nominated to them the Prince his Son, just born at Caernarvon. But M. W. G. other Writers not so credulous, considering doubts; this Circumstance as a Puerility, have thought fit to pass it over in Silence (5). And indeed, it was only a poor Exhortation, little capable of satisfying the Welsh, and not at all agreeable to the Character of Edward. Besides, it is certain, the young Prince was not invested 'till the Year 1301, with the Principality of Wales, being then seventeen Years of Age (6).

The Conquest of Wales, and the universal Esteem the King was in among his Subjects, procuring England a profound Tranquillity, what passed in the Kingdom 'till the War with Scotland, is of no great concern: And therefore, I shall slightly pass over the Domestic Affairs, contenting myself with briefly relating some of the principal Circumstances (7).

We find in the Year 1285, the King took away the Charter of London, and turned out the Mayor, because he suffered himself to be bribed by the Bakers, and put in another by his own Authority (8). But quickly after, the City found means to recover their Charter, by making the King a Present.

This Year the King called a Parliament, which made some Additions to the ancient Statutes, by the Name of the second Statute of Westminster (9).

In the Year 1286, Edward ordered all the Jews in the Kingdom to be seized, upon one and the same Day (10). The Commons granted him (11) a Subsidy of the fifth Part of their Moveables, to expell the Kingdom all such Foreigners, as were a Burden to the Nation. He promised them a Delay, which was dearly purchased (12).

About the middle of the same Year, three important Affairs called Edward into France, where he continued above three Years. As in the mean time, nothing very remarkable passed in England, I shall only relate the fair he had to manage in that Country. The first was his Demand, of the Provinces taken from the Kings John, and Henry III; concerning which, there was a long Negotiation. The second related to the Homage, he was to do to Philip the Fair, King of France, who had lately succeeded Philip the Hardy, his Father. The third was the Agreement, he undertook to procure between the Kingdoms of Arragon and Anjou, concerning the Kingdom of Sicily.

The King finding his Presence was not absolutely necessary in his Kingdom, now in profound Tranquillity, left the Regency to the Earl of Pembroke (13), and embarked for France (14). He spent the best Part of a Year in solliciting the Restitution of the Provinces, taken from the Crown of England, by the Predecessors of Philip the Fair; but all his Pains upon that account were ineffectual. The Court of France being then in a flourishing Condition, and in no danger from England, was deaf to all his Proposals. All the Benefit he could reap from this Negotiation, was a Pension of ten thousand Pounds (16), in lieu of his Claim to certain

King Edward having undertaken the Crusade for the Holy Land, and by reason of the Welsh Wars, and other Affairs, not being able in his own Person to perform it, introduced his Brother Edmund for that Service; and there being six Years Tenants collected from the Clergy, according to the Canon of the second Council of Lyons, laid up and feared in several Monasteries, and other places, for an Aid for the Holy Land; Pope Martin IV then preaching Friers into England for the Exportation and Return of this Money, by his Agents, and foreign Merchants; whereupon King Edward issued out, May 24, 1282, a Writ to hinder it: And moreover, sent Commissioners the next Year to the Places where it was laid up, to see how much there was, and tender it to the keeping of it for the right Use. 1286. Lands situated beyond the Charente, of which Philip kept possession, contrary to the Tenour of the antient Treaty. Upon this foot, the two Monarchs signed a new Treaty; after which, Edward did Homage to Philip. The Form of the Homage, paid only in general Terms, and the previous Proteftations, evidently shew, Edward had still a Mind to keep up his Pretensions, in order to prosecute them at a more favorable Juncture. Without specifying, in his Homage, any particular Country, he affected to include all those Provinces to which he had any Claim. As this is a matter of Moment, and was afterwards attended with great Consequences, it will not be improper to recite the very Words of the Homage, with the Proteftations, as they occur in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

T. II. p. 330. On Wednesday in Whitfun-Week, in the fourteenth Year of the Reign of Edward, and in the first of Philip, at Paris, in a Room of the Royal Palace, King Edward did Homage to King Philip, in the following Terms, spoken by the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

Sire, King of France, King Henry, Father of my Lord the King of England here present, made certain Demands upon Lewis King of France, your Grandfather, wherein a Treaty of Peace was concluded between them. Pursuant to that Treaty, Henry did Homage to your said Grandfather, for the Land he actually held on this Side the Water, and for such, as the said Lewis had obliged himself to put into his Hands, by the above-mentioned Treaty of Peace. My Lord King Edward here present, after the Death of his Father, did Homage to the King your Father, for these Lands, and according to the Tenour of the said Peace. And though my said Lord might with Justice, as several of his Council are of Opinion, refuse to do the same Homage, because the said Peace has not been observed, and because, to his great Prejudice, several Attempts have been made upon the Lands which he holds; nevertheless, he is unwilling at present to enter into Dispute upon that score, provided you will cause the said Peace to be kept, and the Damages he has sustained to be repaired.

I become your Man for the Lands I hold of you, on this Side the Water, according to the Tenour of the Peace made with your Ancestors.

It is easy to see, that, in this Homage, Edward took care of Expressions, not to promise too much. Besides his Proteftations by the Mouth of the Bishop, he would do Homage only in general Terms, for the Lands he held, without specifying any thing, referring to himself the Explanation at some other time. Doubtless whatever his thoughts were, Philip, imagining no doubt, he had a Right to explain the same Terms to his own Advantage, was very ready to receive the Homage, with this affected Obscurity. He even granted him, a few Days after, Letters Patents, whereby he consented, that the Lands possessed by Edward in France, should not be liable to forfeiture, either for unjust Judgment, or denial of Justice. Moreover, he promised to send back the Appealants to the Seneschal of Guienne, and promised to allow him three Months, to maintain or rectify the Judgments. But this Concession was to take place only during the Life of Edward, after which, things were to return to their former State.

These two Affairs kept Edward at the Court of France about a Year. But the Reconciliation he undertook to mediate between the Kings of Sicily and Arragon, employed him much longer, and proved a very troublesome Affair; for which he had no other Reward, but the satisfaction of endeavouring to reconcile these two illustrious Houses. Though this Affair relates not directly to Edward, who acted only as Mediator, yet as it wholly employed him for two Years, I hope it will not be taken amiss if I briefly explain the occasion of those Differences, and the principal Events they produced.

I have already observed in the late Reign, how the Popes invested the House of Swabia with the Crown of Sicily, and the Efforts they afterwards used to wrest it from thence. I left Manfred the Bastard in possession of the two Sicilies, and the Pope solemnly giving the Investiture of these two Kingdoms to Charles of Anjou, after having long amused Prince Edmund, Brother of our Edward, with the hopes of that Crown. It will be necessary to resume, in a few Words, the Sequel of that History, to the time I am now speaking of.

Charles of Anjou, knew better how to improve the Pope's Favour, than Edmund. With the Assistance of the King his Brother, he levied a powerful Army, and came to Rome, where the Pope solemnly crowned him King of the two Sicilies, on the 28th of June 1265. In the Beginning of the next Year, he marched towards the Kingdom of Naples, and on the 26th of February, obtained a complete Victory over Manfred, who was slain on the Spot. Freed by this single Battle from all the Obstacles which lay in his way, he took possession of the two Sicilies, and enjoyed them some time without a Rival. The Gibelines (1), that is, the Party against the Pope, cast down by the flourishing Condition of Charles, who supported the Guelphs, and was himself supported by them, fought all possible means to deprive him of the two Kingdoms. They persuaded Conradin, Son of the Emperor Conrad, that, being the sole Heir of the House of Swabia, he ought to assert his Right to the Sicilies, and snatch the Prey out of the hands of Charles of Anjou. There was no need of much Solicitation to incline Conradin to this Undertaking. Without a Moment's Consideration, the young Prince assumed the Title of King of Sicily, and in spite of the Excommunication thundered against him by the Pope, came into Italy, where at first he made some Progress. This prosperous beginning inspiring him with great Hopes, he advanced towards Naples, to fight his Enemy. Upon his Approach, Charles raised the Siege of Nocera, which he had begun, and marching towards him, met him near the Lacus Fucinus, now called Celano, and gave him Battle. The success was fatal to Conradin, who had the misfortune to lose the Day, and was taken Prisoner. The Conqueror making a cruel use of his Victory, carried his Barbarity so far, as to behead the young Prince, who was but sixteen Years of Age. He caused him to be tried and condemned by the Synodics of the Cities of the Kingdom, who were so base, as blindly to follow the Directions of that bloody Prince.

The Extinction of the House of Swabia, of which Conradin was the last Male, should, one would have thought, disabled the Gibelines for any farther Attempts. But if they were astonished by this fatal Blow, they were not quite disheartened. By the Death of Conradin, the Rights of the House of Swabia were devolved to Peter King of Arragon (2), who had married Constance Daughter of Manfred. Though these Rights came only by a base Son of that House, the Gibelines desired not to draw the King of Arragon into their Quarrel, since it might be the means of procuring him two Kingdoms. John, Lord of Procida, an old Servant of the House of Swabia, took upon him this Negotiation, and to concert Henry of Sicily, the necessary Measures, to accomplish the design of dethroning Charles of Anjou. In the first Place, he secured the Concurrence of Pope Nicholas III, who was displeased with King Charles. Then he went on to Constantinople, and obtained an Aid of Money from the Emperor Michael, who was threatened with a War by the King of Sicily. These Measures being taken, he went and communicated his Project to the King of Arragon. Peter was at first somewhat unwilling to embark in an Undertaking, which seemed beyond his Strength. But the Pope's Approbation, the Grecian Emperor's Money, and the Sicilians Revolt, which he was made to look upon as certain, determined him at length. Besides Procida intimated to him, that he might, without any hazard, be prepared, to improve the good Successes, or relinquish the Undertaking, without appearing to be concerned. To that end, he advised him to fit out a Fleet, on pretence of invading the Moors of Africa, and even to besiege one of their Towns. He added, if, contrary to all Expectation, the Revolt of the Sicilians should fail, he might continue the War upon the Infidels, without discovering he had any other design; but if the Sicilians should keep their Word, he would be ready to improve the Events.

This Project being thus adjusted, John de Procida returned home, to set their Friends to work, when Matters were ripe. The King of Arragon's Armament somewhat alarmed the Kings of France and Sicily, but he knew how to dissemble so well, that he made them easy.

(1) It is uncertain, whence the Names of Guelph and Gibeline were derived. Some give the following Account: In 1139, there happened a Schism in the Church, thro' the Concurrence of Innocent II and Anacletus, the first of whom was favoured by the Emperor; the other by Roger, Count of Sicily and Naples, an ally and vassal of France, who drew to his Side Guelph Duke of Bavaria. The Emperor Conrad III entering Sicily with a German Army, and (Two) by Philip Henry, son, who was brought up at a place in Germany, called Gibelin; Guelph, Duke of Bavaria, entreated to the Assistance of his Army, and it happened, as both Armies were ready to engage, that the Bavarians cried in their Language, Hier Guelph; which being answered by the Two companies led by the Prince, by Hier Gibeline, the Italians retained the Words, to distinguish the different Parties, and called the Frictions by them Gibelines, Gibelines.

(2) When Conradin was on the Scaffold, he threw his Glove into the Square, desiring the Person that took it up, to carry it to a Relation of his, as a Mark of the Investiture which he gave him of the Inheritance of the Family of Swabia, of which he was the last Heir-Male. This Glove was carried to Peter, King of Arragon. Rapin, Account of Byzantine Emperors, Vol. I. p. 44.

1286. When his Fleet was ready, he failed for the Coast of Africa, where he besieged Adacella. He had with him Roger de Lauria, the best Sea-Officer then in Europe. In the mean time, Proveda took all his Measures so well, that in one Night the Sicilians cut the Throats of above eight thousand French, who were then in the Island. This Massacre, which was called the Sicilian Vespers (1), was acted upon Easter-Eve, on the 30th of March 1282. The News being brought to Rome, where Charles of Anjou then was, he made all possible Expedition, to prevent the consequences of this Conspiracy. As he had a Fleet ready, which was designed against the Emperor of Constantinople, he set sail, and arrived before Messina. His sudden coming, so surprized the Inhabitants of that great City, that, despairing of being timely relieved, they offered to surrender upon condition of having their Lives spared. The desire of Revenge, which had wholly possessed the King of Sicily, would not suffer him to grant them that favour. Whereupon the Messinians, finding by his refusal what they were to expect from so revengeful a Prince, resolved to sell their Lives dearly, chusing rather to die with Sword in Hand, than on Gibbets or Scaffolds.

Mean time, the King of Arragon being informed, that the Sicilians had proceeded to far, that there was no danger from their Inconstancy, came in a few days to Palermo, where he was crowned. Then, he sent Charles a Letter; commanding him in a haughty Strain, to quit a Country where he had no farther Pretension. Charles returned him a still more haughty and offensive Answer; but however, fearing the Spanish Fleet would cut off the Provisions that were coming from Naples, he resolved to raise the Siege, and retire into Calabria. He was no sooner gone, but the King of Arragon made his Entry into Messina, where the Inhabitants received him with all possible Demonstrations of Joy and Thankfulness.

Charles, enraged to the last degree, carried his Complaints to Pope Martin IV, Successor of Nicholas. He used, in speaking of the King of Arragon, the most opprobrious and abusive Terms, offering even to fight him hand to hand, or a hundred against a hundred, to make him own himself to be a base, cowardly, and perfidious Traitor. These Words coming to the Ears of the King of Arragon, he sent Ambassadors to Rome, to justify his Conduct, and accept the Challenge. Charles received the Proposal with Joy, and his eager desire to be revenged personally of his Enemy, caused him to consent to a Truce, during which were settled the Conditions of the future single Combat between the two Kings. It was agreed, each should appear at Bourdeaux, at the Head of a hundred Horse, on the 1st of June 1283; and that the King of England should instantly be intreated to appoint the Lists in that City; to honor their Duel with his Presence; or to send some Person in his stead. It must however, be observed, it was expressly said in the Articles: That whatever happened, the two Kings should appear at Bourdeaux, on the Day appointed. But if Edward was present in Person, the intended Duel should not be fought, unless the Parties agreed upon it afterwards. Though all the Historians unanimously affirm, Edward appointed the Lists at Bourdeaux, it is very certain, he refused it. His Letters upon this occasion to the King of Sicily, and the Prince of Salerno his Son, are a clear Evidence, he had never any Thoughts of granting their Request, since he plainly told them, were he to gain the Kingdoms of Sicily and Arragon, he would not appoint the Lists for such a Duel. These Letters are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, taken from the Records of England.

Though Edward's refusal disengaged the two Kings from the obligation to fight, they were however bound by the Articles, to be at Bourdeaux. Charles came on the Day appointed, with a hundred Horse, and stayed there from Sun-rising to Sun-setting; but finding his Adversary did not appear, nor was heard of, he retired. As soon as he was gone, Peter, who was all the while in Bourdeaux, disguised like a Squire, went to the Senschal of the City, and taking a Certificate of his Appearance, left him his Arms for a Testimony. This Proceeding of the King of Arragon, gave occasion to the French Historians to speak dishonorably of that Prince, as if want of Courage was the reason of breaking his Word, and of using that Fraud to evade his Engagements. But it would not be very difficult to justify his Conduct in this respect, if this were a proper Place for it (2).

Though, as I observed, the King of Arragon was freed from the Obligation of fighting, since Edward came not to Bourdeaux, yet his Proceeding was very much exaggerated in France and Italy. It was pretended to be a plain proof, that he was himself convinced of his Injustice to Charles of Anjou, since he durst not venture to decide their Difference by a single Combat, which he himself had accepted. Pope Martin IV, a Frenchman, and wholly devoted to the House of Anjou, thundered against the King of Arragon a Sentence of Excommunication, though he produced the Investiture of Sicily, privately given him by Nicholas III. He even absolved his Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and gave the Kingdom of Arragon to Charles Earl of Valois, second Son of the King of France (3). Notwithstanding all this, Peter still kept the two Kingdoms; and to insult the Pope, under colour of submitting to his Authority, ordered himself to be called only, The Chevalier of Arragon. Martin, perceiving himself thus ridiculed, resolved to make that Prince know, he was not to be insulted with Impunity. He published a Crusade against him, of which Philip III, King of France was declared General, and there were People wunk enough to imagine, they should obtain Paradise, in espousing the Quarrel of the Pope, and the House of Anjou. It is true, few but Frenchmen were engaged in this Crusade, where their King was particularly concerned, since it was intended for placing his Son on the Throne of Arragon.

Whilst Philip was preparing for this Undertaking, Roger Lauria rendered his Master's Arms prosperous in the Mediterranean. He had taken Malta from Charles of Anjou, after gaining a naval Battle, where the French Fleet was entirely destroyed. Immediately after this Victory, he attacked the Coasts of Naples, with design to draw out of his Ports, the Prince of Salerno, to whom his Father King Charles had left the Command of his Fleet. This Design succeeded to his wish. The Prince of Salerno, greedy of Glory, and unable to bear the Insults of Lauria, rashly engaged in a Sea-fight, where he had the misfortune to be vanquished and taken Prisoner. He was forthwith sent to Sicily, where he saw himself in danger of losing his Head on a Scaffold, the Sicilians desirous to make him suffer by way of Retaliation for Conradin. But Constantia, Queen of Arragon, was so generous as to free him from this Peril, by sending him to the King her Husband, who was then in Spain. Charles's Vexation at the loss of his Fleet, and his Son's Imprisonment, was the greater, as he arrived three Days afterwards with a powerful Supply, and had expressly commanded the Prince not to fight till reinforced. This Accident, which entirely disconcerted his Affairs, was, probably, the Cause of his Death on the 6th of June 1285. He left for Successor Charles II, his Son, surnamed The Lame, Prisoner in Spain, to whom the Arragonians gave only the Title of Prince of Salerno during his Captivity.

Neither the Death of Charles, nor the Loss of the Battle of Naples, were capable of diverting Philip from his Projects. In the Month of May, that very Year, he headed his Troops, consisting of fourscore thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse, and (though he heard in his March of the Death of the King his Brother,) entered Roussillon and became Master of Perpignan. Then he advanced into Catalonia, where, after several Conquests, he laid Siege to Girona. The King of Arragon, attacking a Convoy going from Roses to the Siege, was hurt in the Skirmish, and died three Months after of his Wounds. He left Arragon and Catalonia to Prince Alphonso his eldest Son, and Sicily to James his second Son, on condition that, if Alphonso died without Heirs, James should succeed in Arragon, and resign Sicily to Frederic his younger Brother.

The King of France's Successes in the Beginning of the War, did not last to the end of the Campaign. Roger T. Wickes, Lauria attacking the French Fleet, destroyed all the Ships, except a few that escaped to Roses. On the other hand, the Sickness in Philip's Army, retarded his Progress by Land. In fine, being himself seized with the Contagion, he was carried to Perpignan, where he ended his Days on the 6th of October. Philip IV, his Son, surnamed The Fair, was his Successor. Honorius IV, was now chosen in the Walden-room of Martin IV, who died this same Year (4).

Such was the State of the Affairs between the Houses Edward of Arragon and Anjou, when Edward accepting the Media-Crator offered him by both Parties, undertook to adjust their Kings of Difference. The main Difficulty of this Negotiation consisted, in freeing the Prince of Salerno out of the hands of Sicily. The King of Arragon, without which it was impossible to procure a Peace. Edward took great pains to succeed. He had upon that occasion several Interviews with Alphonso. Mezerai affirms, he even went to Sicily to talk 1287. with King James: But the History mentions not this Voyage. In short, at a Conference between him and Alphonsus at Oléron in Bearn, they settled the Terms on which the Prince of Salerno was to be released, and for which, as far as concerned the Ransom, Edward consented to be Security. After this, the Articles of Agreement were confirmed, by a Treaty concluded at Campo Franco the fourth of October 1288. Nicholas IV, Successor to Honorius, strongly opposed the Execution of the Treaty. He thought it too advantageous for the King of Arragon, and too dishonorable for the Holy See; because the Prince of Salerno, without consulting him, had obliged himself to cause the Earl of Valois to renounce the Kingdom of Arragon. This Opposition raised fresh Difficulties: But they were at length surmounted by the Prudence and Pains of Edward, who acted as Mediator with great Impartiality. To facilitate the Execution of the Treaty, he was willing to give English Hostages to the King of Arragon, and to cause the principal Cities of Guienne to interpose as Pledges, Alphonsus doing the same thing with regard to the principal Cities of his Dominions.

In consequence of this Agreement, the Prince of Salerno was set at Liberty, leaving his Sons in Hostage. It seemed, this Affair, which was in so good a way, would quickly be ended; the main Obstacle being removed by that Prince's Liberty, who was bound by the most solemn Oaths. But he performed nothing of what he had sworn. He not only caused himself to be crowned King of the two Sicilies by the Pope, contrary to the express Terms of the Treaty; but also did his utmost to confirm the Earl of Valois in the Resolution to prosecute his pretended Right to the Kingdom of Arragon. When he thought his Affairs in good Order, he feigned a Willingness to return to Imprisonment, as he was obliged, in case he performed not the Articles of the Treaty. For that purpose, he repaired to a certain Place where the King of Arragon was to receive him, and exchange him for the Princes his Sons: But came so well attended, that Alphonsus did not think fit to venture upon his Sincerity. This occasioned mutual Complaints, Reproaches and Apologies; each Party applying to the King of England, as Mediator and Guarantee of the Treaty. Edward, in all appearance, being tired with acting in favour of these Princes, who so ill answered all his Pains, left them to decide their Difference as they pleased, without concerning himself any farther. But not to leave the Reader in Suspence how this Dispute ended, I shall add in two Words, that, after long Negotiations, mixed with many Hostilities, the two Princes adjusted their Quarrel by a Treaty. The Prince of Salerno, called Charles the Lame, kept Sicily on this Side the Faro, which from thenceforth began to be distinguished by the Name of the Kingdom of Naples; and the House of Arragon remained in possession of the Island of Sicily. The Earl of Valois renounced also his Pretensions to the Kingdom of Arragon (1).

After staying above three Years beyond Sea, Edward returned into England in August 1289 (2). His first Care, immediately after his Return, was to reform several Abuses introduced in his Absence, particularly in the Administration of Justice (3). Upon Complaints from all hands, that the Judges suffered themselves to be corrupted with Bribes, he strictly examined into their Conduct, and severely punished the guilty. Of this Number was [Sir Thomas Weyland] the Chief Justiciary (4), or first Judge, who was banished the Realm, and his Estate confiscated (5). These Misdemeanours, which were but too frequent, gave the King occasion to oblige the Judges to swear, that for the future they would take neither Money nor Present of any Kind, except only a Breakfast, which they might accept, provided there was no Excess. A Historian affirms, the King got above a hundred thousand Marks by the Confiscation of the Estates of those that had been faulty (6).

In the beginning of the Year 1290, Edward convened a Parliament (7), where the Statute of Westminster, the Third (8), were enacted, and the Banishment (9) of the Jews was absolutely revoked. The Nation had long desired it, but the Jews still found means to divert the Blow, by Presents to the King and his Ministers. They would fain have used the same Method now, but could not prevail; the King being unable to protect them any longer without disobliging the Parliament. Their immovable Goods were confiscated, but they had leave to carry away the rest with them. It is the general Opinion, that they began to settle in the Kingdom in the Reign of William the Conqueror: But some believe their Settlement more ancient. At first their Number was small, but, by Degrees, they increased to fifteen thousand. Their Money procured them several considerable Privileges, confirmed by Edward himself, as a Synagogue at London, a Head of their Religion, being a sort of High-Priest (10), and Judges of their own Nation to hear and determine their Differences. They lost all these Advantages, by not being able to curb their insatiable Greediness of enriching themselves by unlawful means, as Usury, Adulteration of the Coin, and the like, which must render the Practisers odious. As for the Imputation of crucifying, from time to time, Christian Children, one may almost be sure it was only a Calumny invented by their Enemies (11).

We are now come to the Grand Affair of the Reign of Edward I, I mean, the Conquest of Scotland; of which it is extremely difficult, not to say impossible, to speak in a satisfactory manner to the English and Scots. Though the two Nations almost agree in the Facts, and the Occasion of this Conquest, they widely differ however as to the Right. If we believe the English, Edward did nothing on this occasion, but what was agreeable to Reason and Justice. The Scots, on the contrary, pretend, he was led by Ambition alone to take advantage of the Troubles of Scotland, in order to become Master of the Kingdom on frivolous Pretences. Though several Centuries are passed since this Event, Historians have not been yet able to lay aside their national Prejudices. The English still consider Edward I, as a great Prince, employing his Arms only in maintaining the Justice of his Cause. The Scots speak of him as a Tyrant, vowing the Destruction of their Nation; and, contrary to all manner of Right, intent upon satisfying his Ambition, in uniting all the People of Great Britain under his Dominion. As I am not engaged in either Party by Birth or any other Motive, I flatter myself with having impartially examined this Affair, and produced from the Collection of the Publick Acts such Light, as may serve to give a just Notion of the thing. To this end, it will be necessary to be somewhat particular, as it is the only possible Means to dispel the Prejudices, which help to darken the Affair.

Alexander III, King of Scotland, married, as was said elsewhere, Margaret Daughter of Henry III, King of England, and Sister of Edward. He had by her three Children, Alexander, David, and Margaret. David died an Infant, and Margaret was married to Eric King of Norway, in 1281. It was agreed in the Marriage-Con-

But the Parliament answered, by the Earl of Gloucester, their Spokesman, that they would grant nothing, unless they saw the King personally present. Whereupon, the Treasurer imposed a Tallage on the Cities, Burroughs, and the King's Demesnes. T. Wals. p. 117.

David King of Scotland had but one Son named Henry, who dying before him, left three Sons, viz. Malcolm IV, who ascended the Throne after his Grandfather, and died without Heirs; William, who succeeded his elder Brother; and David who was Earl of Huntingdon in England. The Race of William being extinct by the Death of Margaret of Norway, there was a necessity of going back to that of David Earl of Huntingdon, third Son of Prince Henry. David died without Issue-Male; but left three Daughters, Margaret married to Alan of Galloway, Isabella Wife of Robert Bruce, and Ada Wife of Henry Fitzroy (1) an English Lord. Margaret, the eldest of the three Sisters, left only two Daughters, Devergula, called by some Donnagilla, and Marjory. Devergula married John Baliol, by whom she had a Son of the same Name, one of the two Candidates for the Crown. Marjory, Wife of John Comyn, died without Issue. Isabella, second Daughter of David, had by Robert Bruce, a Son named Robert from his Father, the other Candidate. Ada, third Daughter of David, left a Son called John Hastings, who likewise pretended to the Crown. To avoid Confusion, I shall defer speaking of this third Candidate, and confine myself at present to the two principal Competitors, namely, John Baliol, and Robert Bruce, who alone had properly a Right to pretend to the Succession.

Foundation of the 1. les of the Competitors.

It must be observed, that at the time of Margaret of Norway's death, the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntingdon were not alive. But Devergula, Daughter of the eldest, was still living, and resigned her Title to the eldest John Baliol her Son, who, as descended from the eldest of David's Daughters, claimed a Right to be preferred before all the other Candidates. On the other hand, Robert Bruce Son of the younger Daughter, alleged for himself, that he was one degree nearer than Baliol, since he was Grandson to David, whereas his Rival was but Grandson to the eldest Daughter of the same Prince. It was objected, that Devergula being in the same degree with him, ought to succeed, since she was Daughter to the eldest, whereas he was only Son to a younger Daughter of David. But he replied, that where the Degree is the same, the Males ought to be preferred to the Females; and that it was the constant Law and Custom of all States; for which he produced several Precedents, from the Histories of foreign Countries. Thus stood the Case, which could not be decided without displeasing one half of the Kingdom.

Here it is that we begin to find Disagreement between the English and Scotch Historians. The latter affirm, Things were in such a State, that it was impossible to find in Scotland impartial Judges. They add, that supposing such could have been found, it would have been very difficult to execute their Sentence, by reason of the equality of Credit and Power in both Parties. Baliol was Lord of the County of Galloway, one of the most considerable of the Kingdom. He was likewise supported by the Comyns, a Family of great Power and Interest. Robert Bruce held in Scotland, the Earldom of Cleveiland, and in Scotland, those of Arundale and Carrick. Moreover, by means of his Son Robert, who had with his Wife the Earldom of Carrick, he was allied to the most powerful Families of Scotland. So that, continue they, to avoid a Civil War, which could not fail to be kindled, both Parties agreed to refer the decision of this important Affair to the King of England. It was believed, all good Offices might be expected from him, as well because of the good Understanding which had long subsisted between the two Nations, as in return for their ready Consent to the Marriage of the Prince his Son, with their late Queen.

this.

He was intreated therefore, say they, to be Judge of this Dispute, and to assist the Person he should think proper to place on the Throne. They add, that Edward accepted the Mediation, and came to Norham, where he summoned the States of Scotland (2), protesting, he assembled them not as Sovereign (3), but as a Friend, that desired them to meet the Arbitrator chosen by themselves. But this is a fact denied by the English. They affirm, that Edward summoned the States of Scotland to Norham, not as Friend and Umpire, but by Virtue of his Right of Sovereignty over Scotland. They add, the bare Consideration of the Situation of Norham, a Town in England, plainly enough shows, that Edward exercised an Act of Sovereignty, in assembling the States of Scotland in his own Kingdom. The Scots reply, this Proof cannot take Place, since upon this very occasion Edward granted them Letters Patents, which entirely destroys it. His Words are these: That he did not intend that the coming of the Scots on this Side the Tweed, should be any Prejudice to them, or that for the future, upon any account whatever, they should be obliged to come and sit with him on this Side the River. So express a Declaration, which seems to prove, that Edward pretended not to the Sovereignty of Scotland, is indeed only an Evidence of his Policy or Dissimulation; since he certainly designed then to establish the Right of Sovereignty. Accordingly, when it was once established, he filed his Letters Patents, a pure Concession, which might be, and was actually, revoked. In the view this Monarch had of causing his Sovereignty to be acknowledged by the States of Scotland, as will be seen hereafter, it was by no means proper to alarm the Scots by an Act of absolute Authority, before the States were assembled. Such a Step might have led them to take measures destructive of his Designs. It was much more natural and more advantageous for him, to convene the States first, and lead them by degrees to the acknowledgment he wanted to extort from them. So that, probably, when he summoned the States to Norham, he made use of ambiguous and cautious Expressions, proper to hide his real Intention. It was not his Interest then to discover it, though he intended to use this same Assembly to strengthen his Right.

Buchanan pretends, that, immediately after the young Is. Pr. Queen's death, Edward formed the Project of becoming master of Scotland. Perhaps he goes too far. It is much more likely, his first View was only to cause himself to be acknowledged for Sovereign of that Kingdom; whether he imagined it his due, or had a mind to improve the favorable opportunity of firmly establishing this pretended Right. The better to accomplish his Design, continues the same Historian, he persuaded eight other Persons, besides the two above-named, to claim the Crown. His Intent was, according to this Historian, to perplex the Affair, that the two chief Candidates might see, he should not want means to render their Titles dubious, in case they were not plant to his Will.

After these Remarks, which are necessary for the Sequel, it is time to come to the Decision of this famous Process. But first it is requisite to observe, that this Affair contains two Things, really distinct from each other, namely, the Right of Succession to the Crown of Scotland, and the Right of Sovereignty over the same Kingdom, claimed by Edward. The former appears at first sight to be the most important, and the latter seems only to be an incident question arising upon its other. But we shall find, it became the main Point, by its fatal Consequences, and therefore it is not to be thought strange, that I should stay to explain it. It must be further observed, that the Particulars I am going to relate, are taken from a Journal, or Verbal Process, inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, made by Mr. John de Cadam, one of Edward's Clerks or Notaries. This Observation should induce us to read with some Caution, what appears to be too much in favor of the King of England, with regard to his Claim to the Sovereignty of Scotland.

The States of Scotland being met at Norham, May 10. 1291. Roger le Brabazon Chief Justiciary of England, speaking by Order, and in the Name of the King, his Master, who was present, told them, That the King of England, considering the unsettled State of Scotland, had required the States to assemble in that Place, to lay before them certain Matters, tending to the Preservation of the Peace and Tranquillity of the Kingdom: That he had no design to usurp the Rights of any Person, to stop the Course of Justice, or to infringe the Liberties of the People of Scotland; but, as Sovereign Lord of Scotland, he was come to do Justice to all: And that this might be done with more ease, though what he claimed could not be justly disputed, he demanded, as a superabundant Right, the States assent to, and recognition of his Superiority and direct Dominion: That then he would make use of their Counsels to do what Justice and Reason required. The States, extremely surprized at this Proposal, required Time to consult with the absent Bishops and Barons, to the end they might return an uniform Answer in an Affair of such Importance. Edward, in his Turn, showed some Surprise, that the States should require Time to give in their Answer. He said, he had reason to believe they were come prepared for this Matter, since they were not ignorant of his Intention; and therefore he gave them only the rest of that Day to consider of his Demand. On the Morrow, the States insisting upon a longer Time, the King granted them three Weeks, reckoning from the 10th of May. During that time they were to prepare whatever they had to object to his Pretensions, and all the Acts and Monuments whereby they might think to invalidate his Demand.

Though, according to the Time appointed by the King, the next Meeting was to be on the first of June; I find however in the Journal, which I take for my Guide, only that of the second of the same Month. The Bishop of Bath and Wells was Spokesman for the King, and recited what had been done in the two former Assemblies. Adding, that the three Weeks granted to the States being expired, and they had not produced or alleged any Thing to invalidate his Right, his Intention was, to act by virtue of his acknowledged Sovereignty over the Kingdom of Scotland, and as Sovereign, to do Justice to the Candidates.

Remains to be said of the States

Let us stay a moment to make one Remark upon this Subject. How good an opinion soever a Man may have of the Faithfulness of Edward, and the Notary, that drew up the Journal, from whence, what I have related is taken, he cannot help perceiving, there is something wanting here. In the two preceding Assemblies, Edward produced his pretensions to the Sovereignty of Scotland. The States, far from immediately owning this Sovereignty, require time to consult together upon so nice a Point. The King grants them three Weeks, and that time being expired, in the first meeting, mentioned in the Journal, the Chancellor of England begins with saying, the States had produced or alleged nothing against the King's Pretensions. Ought he not rather to begin with calling upon the States for their Answer, which the Journal should mention; either by relating their Objections or Assent, or at least by declaring they had returned no Answer, and then the Chancellor's Speech would come to the purpose? But instead of this, he begins with declaring, that the States having nothing to say against the King's Pretension, Edward was resolved to make use of his Right. This makes it suspicious, either that the Account of what passed that Day is curtailed, or the Day before there was another Assembly, where the States had produced their Proofs, but which the Author of the Journal did not think proper to mention. For it was before observed, that, according to the time fixed by the King, there was to be an Assembly on the first of June, whereas this was not till the second. But I offer this only as a Conjecture, on which I do not pretend to establish any thing. The grand Difficulty lies in that, after a three Weeks Consultation, it is strange, the States of Scotland should have nothing to answer or object to Edward's Pretension. It is certain, that hitherto, the Sovereignty of the Crown of England over Scotland, had never been so generally acknowledged, that the bare public Evidence could silence the States. Of this there needs no other Proof, than the Marriage-Articles before-mentioned, where the Scots had taken so great care to maintain their Independence. In the second place, the time they took, to consult about the King's Demand, plainly shows, they were not fully persuaded of their Subjection to the Crown of England. In short, Edward's very precaution in requiring this Acknowledgment, testifies, that the thing was at least doubtful. It is not customary to act in such a manner, when a Man has a known and undeniable Right. If it be true then, that the States returned no Answer to the King's Demand, it must be thought, either they were over-awed; or the two principal Candidates united, and prevailed with the States, by secret Practices, not to oppose the Pretensions of the King of England. Probably they were afraid of this incident, of retarding the Decision of the main Affair. But to return to our Journal.

Edward
dressed for the King by an Act of Council.

The High-Chancellor having spoken as is related in the Journal, and taking his Master's Right for granted, addressed himself first to Robert Bruce, and demanded of him, Whether he would acknowledge the King of England for Sovereign of Scotland, and receive Justice from him, as such. The Journal adds, Robert Bruce answered openly and expressly, that he owned the King of England for Sovereign Lord of the Realm of Scotland, and consented to receive from him as such, the Judgment that Prince should think fit to pronounce. The same Question being put to Florence Earl of Holland, and the Lord John Hastings (1), they both made the same Answer. After that, Patrick of Dunbar Earl of March, William de Ros, Walter de Huntercombe, William Vescy by Proctor, Robert de Pynney, and Nicholas de Soules, appeared, and demanded to be admitted separately, to prove that the Crown of Scotland was devolved to them by Right of Succession. The same Question was put to them, as to the three first, concerning Edward's Right; to which having returned the same Answer, their Petition was received. John Baliol being absent, his Gentleman of Horse (2) stood up, and alleging some Excuse for his Master's Absence, demanded, in his Name, that

On the Morrow, after the Chancellor's Recapitulation of what had passed to that time, Baliol, who was present, was asked the same Question as the rest of the Candidates, and made the like Answer. Then, the Chancellor protested aloud in the King's Name, That although the King of England, acted on this Occasion as Sovereign Lord of Scotland, he did not intend thereby to depart from the Hereditary Right, he might have to the Crown of that Kingdom; or to exclude himself as to the Person. That he expressly reserved to himself the Liberty to prosecute his Right, as the rest of the Candidates, when and how he pleased. As soon as the Chancellor had done speaking, the King repeated word for word, the same Protestation with his own Mouth. Then John Comyn Lord of Badenoch rose up, and demanded leave to prove his lawful Right to the Crown. His request was granted, after recognising, like the rest, the King of England's Sovereignty. What concerned Edward being thus settled, the Candidates drew up a Writing, whereby they acknowledged him Sovereign Lord of Scotland. This Writing was signed and sealed by All, and particularly by Robert Bruce, and John Baliol. As for the Silence of the States on this occasion, Edward, without giving himself any farther trouble, took it for an Assent, and became possessed of the Sovereignty.

This Step being made, the King proceeded farther. He represented to the Competitors, it would be in vain to give Sentence in favour of one of them, if it was not in his Power to put it in Execution. Upon this Foundation, he demanded the possession of the Kingdom; that he might be able to deliver it to the Person that should be declared King. To this the Candidates consented, and signed an Instrument according to his Desire; as if their bare Pretensions to the Crown had empowered them to dispose of the Kingdom, as they pleased. In this Writing, they own the King of England, for Sovereign Lord of Scotland, and as such, for Judge of the Process concerning the Succession. They promised to hold for good and valid, the Judgment he should pronounce. They agreed, he should be put in possession of all the Castles, and the whole Kingdom, in order to restore it to Him, for whom it should be adjudged. They added however this Condition, that he should be obliged to restore it within two Months after Judgment given, in the same State he received it, saving to him the Homage of the new King.

Whatever had been hitherto done in favour of Edward, was only the Acts of private Persons; but among them were Bruce and Baliol, who divided all Scotland between them, and consequently their Approbation drew after it that of the whole Kingdom. In those Days of Anarchy, the Regents had no great Authority, neither did they dare to do any thing displeasing to the King, or the two chief Candidates, one of whom was to be their Master. As to the States, after Edward perceived they were disinclined to favour his Pretensions, he consulted them no more. As they were assembled out of Scotland, and in the Power of the King, they were not free to take such Measures as they should have desired. So the King met with little Opposition from the Governours of the Castles, when he came to take possession of the Kingdom. William de Umfraville, who had the Custody of the Castles of Dundee and Forfar, was the only Person that made any Resistance. He considered the Act above-mentioned as very irregular; and could not resolve, upon such a Warrant, to deliver up the Places committed to his Trust, neither by the King of England, nor by the Candidates. It was necessary that the Competitors, Regents, and King himself, should bind themselves by an express Act, to indemnify him, in case he should one Day come to be called to an Account.

Whatever Edward's pretensions were, it is certain the Sovereignty of the Crown of England, had never been acknowledged in Scotland. Accordingly the Scots in general, could not but look upon the Proceedings of the Candidates, and the Regents themselves, as a manifest Prevarication. And yet, it was very difficult to act otherwise. All the great Men were pained either by Edward's Promises, or awed by his Threats. The Troops he had ordered to march to Nisbarn, under colour of guarding the States of Scotland, did not a little help to inspire them with Terror. So that almost wherever he pleased was forced to be done. It was necessary however, for the Regents to give the People some Satisfaction, in showing them they took care of their Interests. To that end, they demanded of Edward Letters Patents, declaring that the Judgment of the Process should be 1291. given in the Kingdom of Scotland. Edward considering this Step, as a sort of Approbation of his Sovereignty, because the Demand was so exprest as not to offend him, readily condescended to their very humble Petition, and ordered the desired Letters to be dispatched out of his hand.

The Affair of the Sovereignty being thus ended, though without the Intervention of the States, the Examination of the Titles of the several Competitors for the Crown came on, that the King might know the Ground of their respective Pretensions. To this Purpose, it was agreed among them, that Balliol and Comyn, as well for agreed among them, that Balliol and Comyn, as well for themselves as for all the Candidates, should nominate forty Persons, and Robert Bruce, in like manner, should chuse forty others, to hear and discuss the Rights of the Competitors. That to these Fourscore, the King should add about twenty four more, and these Commissioners, after a mature Examination, should make their Report to the King.

In the Assembly of the 5th of June, nothing more was done, than giving in the Names of the Examiners that were chosen.

The next Days, the King ordered the Examiners to appoint the time and place of Meeting, for their Examination. All agreed upon Berwick, a Town in Scotland, situated on the Tweed, for the Place. But as they could not agree upon the Day, the King fixed it to the 2d of August following.

There was another Assembly at Norham, where the Regents of Scotland resigned their Patents to the King, and the Governours of the Castles their Commissions, to be disposed of at his Pleasure. Edward received, but returned, them again, with the necessary Alterations to show that they governed in his Name. The same Day he made the Bishop of Caithness Chancellor of Scotland, and joined with him Walter de Hamondsham an Englishman, one of his Clerks, as an Associate.

On the 12th of June, Edward issued Orders to all that held any Office in the Kingdom of Scotland, to come and swear Fealty to him, which was done that Day by all that were present (1). The Competitors took the same Oath; after which, the Assembly broke up till the Day appointed for the meeting at Berwick (2).

Though it was still a good while to that Day, Edward came quickly after, and on the 3d of July made the following Protestation: That altho' he had granted, that the Affair of the Succession should be tried in the Kingdom of Scotland, he did not intend to bind himself to the same Condescension, if the same Case should happen again, or on any other occasion. Probably the Assembly, before whom he made this Declaration, was neither full, nor authorized to receive it, since the Examiners were not to meet at Berwick till the 3d of August, that is, a Month after.

The Day being come, the Examining Commissioners met at Berwick, in the Presence of the King, and received the Petitions of the Candidates, in the following Order. But because these Petitions, containing the Grounds of their Pretensions, were founded on the Genealogy of the Royal Family of Scotland, it is necessary to see this Genealogy, tho' supposititious, without which it would be difficult to understand their respective Rights.

Florence Earl of Holland, thow'd, he was descended from Ada, Daughter of Prince Henry, and Sister of the Kings Malcolm IV. and William.

William de Veisy asserted, he was Issue of Margaret, Daughter of King William.

Robert de Pynkeny affirmed, he came from Margaret, Daughter of Prince Henry, and Sister of the Kings Malcolm and William.

Nicholas de Soules said, that being Grandson of Alexander II., by Margery, second Daughter of that King; and the Race of Margaret, eldest Sister of his Mother, being extinct, the Crown was devolved to him as next Heir.

Patric Galythly founded his Claim on his being Grandson to King William, by Henry Son of that Prince. Probably Henry, Father of Patric, was a Bastard, since had he been legitimate, his Son's Title would have been indisputable.

Roger de Mandeville claimed the Crown as Son of Africa, Daughter of King William.

John Hastings maintained, that the Kingdom of Scotland being divisible, ought to be parted among the Descendants of the three Daughters of David Earl of Huntington, the youngest of whom was his Mother.

Robert de Ros called himself Issue of Ishola, eldest Daughter of King William, and Sister of Alexander II.

John Comyn derived his Claim higher, namely, from Donald formerly King of Scotland.

John Balliol set forth, that he was Son of Deverguld, eldest Daughter of Margaret, the eldest of the Daughters of David Earl of Huntington; and the Race of King William being extinct, he was the next Heir to the late Queen. It must be observed, he took it for granted in his Petition, that Margery and Ishola, eldest Daughters of Alexander II., died without Issue, though Nicholas de Soules called himself Son of the first. After that, passing over in silence, Henry, Ishola, Ilda, Margaret, and Africa, Children of King William, from whom Galythly, Ros, Dunbar, Veisy, and Mandeville, professed themselves Descendants, he proceeded to the Family of David, younger Brother to King William. His silence leaves room to presume, either these Competitors had falsely set forth their Genealogies, or those from whom they derived their Descent were Bastards, otherwise their Issue would have had more Right to the Crown than David's. Accordingly we shall see in the Sequel, that their Pretensions were not regarded at all. It may be farther observed, this favours what is said by Buchanan, that Edward engaged eight Candidates, besides Balliol and Bruce, to demand the Crown, on purpose to puzzle the Cause. And indeed it is easy to see, that of all the above-named, Balliol excepted, there was not one that had the least Title to the Succession, supposing, as is very likely, that they were descended from Bastards, and that Nicholas de Soules, had not truly set forth his Genealogy.

Robert Bruce alleged, that he was by one degree nearer than Balliol, since he was Grandson of David, whereas his Rival was only Grandson of his Daughter. That indeed Deverguld was in the same degree with himself, but could not claim the Crown, because it was the Custom to prefer the Males before the Females, in the same degree of Consanguinity. To strengthen his Title, he added, that Alexander II., declared him his Heir, in case he died without Issue, and offered to prove it by living Witnesses. Moreover, he maintained that Alexander III. always looked upon him as his presumptive Heir, and declared it to such as were familiar with him.

All these Petitions being read, and the King, says the Journal, willing to give the Commissioners Time to examine them, appointed the second of June of the ensuing Year 1292, for another Assembly (2), where the Candidates might more fully urge their respective Rights (3).

I shall make use of this Interval to examine as briefly as possible, the Grounds on which Edward built his Right of Sovereignty over Scotland. We find them at large in a Memorial drawn by that Prince's Order. And because this Memorial is frequently alleged by the English Authors, as containing the justifying Proofs of the Right of Sovereignty enjoyed immemorially by England, over Scotland, it will not be amiss to give an Abstract thereof, to the end the Reader may be perfectly informed concerning this Matter.

PROOFS alleged by EDWARD I. to establish the RIGHT of SOVEREIGNTY of the KINGS of ENGLAND over SCOTLAND.

IN the Year 901 Edward the Elder, King of England, subjected to his Dominion the Kings of the Scots, *M. W. (2) In the mean time, the chief Persons in the Kingdom of Scotland, and the Citizens and Burgess of each City and Town therein, did, during the Months of June and July, swear Allegiance to King Edward; and the Inhabitants of Berwick in particular, on June 30: Among whom are mentioned Ralph Philips, Robert Oliver, John de Knapton, Thomas le Barber, &c. They were the People that inhabited the Galloway in Scotland, and being perpetually harassed with the incursions of the Picts and Scots, retired into Flintshire, about the River Clwyd. See Cantabrigia in Lib. Thome.

1291. Wales and his Subjects, chose Edward the Elder for their Father and Lord, and made a strict Alliance with him. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

In the Year 924, the same Edward reigned over all the Inhabitants of Great Britain, English, Scots, Cumbrians, Danes and Britons. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

In the Year 926, King Athelstan, Son of Edward, vanquished Constantine King of Scotland, together with the King of the Wenii (1), and compelled them to fly. After the Victory they took an Oath to him, and concluded an Alliance with him at Emothe, July the 4th. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

We find in the Histories of William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, and Ralph de Diceto, that Athelstan forced Constantine King of Scotland, to quit his Crown; and afterwards gave him leave to resume it, on condition he should hold it of the Kings of England, saying, It was more glorious to make Kings, than to be one.

In 934, the same Athelstan vanquished Constantine, who had revolted, and ravaged Scotland as far as Dunferdy. Constantine gave him his Son in Hostage, with great Presents, and a Peace was concluded between them. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden, Henry de Huntington, Ralph de Diceto.

In the Year 937, Eugenius King of Cumberland, and Constantine King of Scotland, met Athelstan at Dacor, and submitted to his Mercy. Athelstan, commanding Constantine to cause his Son to be baptized, stood Godfather himself. William of Malmesbury.

In 940, Athelstan was succeeded by Edmund, who reigned four Years, during which the Scots revolted not.

In 947, Edred, Brother and Successor of Edmund, having vanquished the Northumbrians, carried his Arms into Scotland. The Scots seized with Fear, submitted without Resistance, and swore the Fealty that was due to him. Edred set over the Scots a King, called Yric. Marianus Scotus, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington.

In the Year 955, Eadwy was King of England after Edred, and reigned four Years, without any Revolt of the Scots.

In 997, Edgar King of England having summoned to his Court Kenneth King of Scotland, Malcolm of Cumberland, and six other Kings, made them row in his Barge, which he himself steered. He said upon that Occasion, as it is affirmed, that his Successors might now boast of being really Kings of England, since they enjoyed so great a Prerogative.

Another time the same Edgar being informed, that Kenneth had spoken ill of him, sent for him to his Court, and walking with him into the Fields, offered him the Choice of two Swords, to fight with him. Kenneth refused it, and casting himself at Edgar's Feet, begged his Pardon, and obtained it. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Diceto.

During the Reigns of Edward the Martyr, Ethelred II, and Edmund Ironside, the Scots did not revolt.

In 1017, Canute the Great, at his Return from Rome, in the 15th Year of his Reign, subdued Scotland with ease, which had revolted, and King Malcolm was subject to him. Canute was King of England, Denmark, Norway and Scotland. Marianus Scotus, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Diceto.

It does not appear that the Scots revolted, during the Reigns of Harold II, and Hardecnut.

In the Reign of Edward the Confessor, Steward Earl of Northumberland vanquished Mackbeth King of Scotland, and slew him. After which, by the Command of King Edward, he placed Malcolm, Son of the King of Cumberland, on the Throne of Scotland. Ibid.

There are likewise these Words in the History of William of Malmesbury, King Edward gave the Kingdom of Scotland to Malcolm, Son of the King of Cumberland, to hold it of the Crown of England.

There is nothing concerning the Scots, whilst Harold II was on the Throne of England.

William the Bastard having marched into Scotland, in the sixth Year of his Reign, Malcolm met him at Aberneth, where he did him Homage, or became his Man. Chron. of St. Albans.

In the same Chronicle it is said, that William returned into England, after receiving the Homage of Malcolm, and some Hostages.

In the third Year of William Rufus, Malcolm revolting and ravaging Northumberland, William, accompanied by Robert his Brother, led his Army into Scotland, and made Peace with Malcolm, on condition that Malcolm should obey him, as he obeyed William his Father. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

Henry of Huntington says, Malcolm, seized with Fear, became King William's Man (2).

The same King dethroned David of Scotland, and placed Edgar, Son of Malcolm, in his Room.

Edgar King of Scotland dying, Alexander I. his Brother, succeeded him, by the Consent of Henry I. King of England. Henry of Huntington.

Stephen King of England having demanded Homage of David King of Scotland, and upon his refusing it, because he had taken an Oath to Matilda, Henry his Son did Homage to King Stephen. Marianus Scotus, Henry of Huntington, Roger de Hoveden.

William King of Scotland, David Earl of Huntington his Brother, the Earls and Barons of Scotland, did Homage to Henry II. King of England, and swore Fealty (3) to him.

In the Year 1174, William King of Scotland ravaging England, was taken Prisoner and delivered to King Henry II. who set him at Liberty, on condition he should do him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland.

As the Treaty between these two Kings has been spoken of elsewhere, it is needless to repeat it here. It suffices to say in a Word, that William, to obtain his Liberty, was forced to promise to do full Homage to Henry II. for the Kingdom of Scotland, and performed his word. This is the best Proof in favour of Edward, and accordingly he chiefly insists upon it in the Memorial; entering into a long Detail, which amounts to what is above-related.

In the Reign of Richard, the Scots are not found to revolt. On the contrary, William came to Canterbury, to do Homage to Richard.

Edward wisely passes over here in silence the Letters Patents of Richard I. whereby he relinquished the Sovereignty of the Kingdom of Scotland.

The same William came and did Homage to King John at Lincoln, and swore Fealty to him upon the Cross of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury. Roger de Hoveden.

The same King John would have made War upon William, for having, without his Consent, married his Daughter to the Earl of Boulogne. This is extant in the Chronicle of the Monastery of Bridlington. It is said also in the Chronicle of the Abbey of Kyngeswode, that William gave his two Daughters in Hostage to King John.

Henry III. in the 35th Year of his Reign, came to York, to marry his Daughter to Alexander King of Scotland, and the latter did there Homage to the King of England. The Guardianship of the young King, and the Regency of the Kingdom, were conferred on Robert de Ros and John Baliol, by the Advice of the great Men of both Kingdoms. Chron. of St. Albans.

To strengthen all these Proofs, Edward heaped together some Passages, extracted from divers Charters and several Bulls, and from a Book intitled, The Life of St. John of Beverly.

In a Charter of Edgar King of Scotland, granted to the Church of Durham, that Prince acknowledges, he holds the Land of Londony, and the whole Kingdom of Scotland, by the Grant of William King of England his Lord.

In another Charter, William King of Scotland grants to King John of England his dear Lord, the Power of marrying Alexander his Son, Prince of Scotland, to whom he pleases. Moreover he promises King John, that, whatever happens, he and Prince Alexander his Son, will be true to Henry, Son of John, as their Sovereign Lord.

In a Brief of Gregory IX, that Pope ordered the Barons of Scotland to join with the King of England against their own Prince, in case the latter should break the Treaty made with Henry II.

The same Pope in another Brief commanded the Archbishop of York, and the Bishop of Carlisle, to persuade the King of Scotland to keep the Treaty.

(1) In our printed Copies of Hoveden, they are called Wetumii. See page 424. Edit. 1601. Probably Saeth-Wales.

(2) That is, did him Homage, the Form of which you have in the second Statute 17. Edm. II. When a Freeman shall do Homage, he shall hold his Hans, together between the Hams of his Lord, and shall say thus on his Knees: I become your Man from this Day forth, for Life, for Member, and for worldly Honour, and shall owe you my Fais for the Land I hold of you, saving the Faith I owe to our Sovereign Lord the King, and to my other Lords.

The Ecclesiasticks say, instead of I become your Man, I do you Homage, and to you shall be faithful and loyal.

(3) Fealty, from the Latin, Fidelitas: The Form of it see in Arms 14. Edm. I. Stat. 2. When a Free-Man shall do Fealty, he shall hold his Right Hand over the Book, and say: Hear you, my Lord, that I A. B. shall be to you faithful and true, and shall owe my Fealty to you, for the Land that I hold of you, and truly shall do you the Customs and Services that I ought to do you at the Terms assigned, so help me God, and all the Saints. He that holds it and by this Oath only, holdeth in the freest manner that any Man in England under the King may hold.

1291. In another directed to the King of Scotland, the same Pope told him, that since he was Liege-Man of the King of England, and had sworn Fealty to him, he ought not to attempt any thing against him.

Pope Clement writing to Henry King of England in behalf of the Bishop of St. Andrews, dispossessed of his See by the King of Scotland, requires him among other things, to warn, exhort, and if necessary, to force that Prince, by the Power committed unto him, to restore the Bishop.

The Proof taken from the Life of St. John of Beverly, the Author whereof is unknown, consists of this Narrative. King Athelstan carrying his Arms into Scotland, meets by the way certain People, who were just cured of Blindness and Lameness, by the Intercession of St. John of Beverly. Whereupon, he resolves to go and perform his Devotions, in the Church where the Body of this Saint lay. After saying his Prayers, he left his Dagger on the Altar, as a Pledge of what he had promised the Saint, in case he succeeded in his Undertaking. Then entering Scotland, St. John appears to him and assures him of his Assistance. Upon this Assurance Athelstan attacks the Scots, and gains a signal Victory. After that, he subdued the whole Kingdom of Scotland, and stayed there three Years. In his Return to England, a great Rock stood in his way, and he besought God, through the Mediation of St. John of Beverly, to give him some Sign, whereby the Spectators might know, the Scots were justly subdued by the English, and the conquered Kingdom ought for ever to pay Tribute to his Successors. Then drawing his Sword, he struck the Rock, which yielded like Butter, and made a Hole in it an Ell deep. Whereupon the Author adds, that this is an evident Sign Scotland was subjected by the English.

Edward produced some other Testimonies, but without naming his Authors, to shew, the Lords of Galloway had done Homage to the King of England.

In 1185, Roland Lord of Galloway submitted to the King of England, fearing, as it is presumed, says the Author, the Power of that Monarch, who was advancing with a great Army to make War upon him.

Henry II, King of England, having received the Homage of Alan of Galloway, and of David Brother of King William, returned into his Dominions.

In the 22d Year of Henry II, Gilbert Son of Fergus Lord of Galloway came with the King of Scotland into England; where he became Liege-Man of Henry the Father, and swore Fealty to him. Which done, in order to gain his Good-Will, he gave him a thousand Marks of Silver, and his Son Duncan in Hostage.

These are the Proofs used by Edward to justify his Right of Sovereignty over Scotland. As it passes for certain, among several English Historians, that Edward undeniably proved his Right from ancient Chronicles, I imagined, the Reader would not be displeased to be able to judge for himself, without being obliged to recur to the Writers of both Parties. For which reason I have retrenched none of these Proofs, though some of them are far enough from being evident.

Certainly, there is reason to think it strange that the Scots should find nothing to object to these Proofs, the greatest Part whereof are very weak, not to say entirely trifling. But it must be considered, they were in England over-whelmed by the Presence of the King; and that Bruce and Balliol, who were in great Credit, did all that lay in their Power to prevent any Incidents, that might retard the Decision of the main Affair. However, since Edward supported his Pretensions by the Proofs set forth in the Memorial; and the Homage required of the Kings of Scotland, was the sole cause of the War which was afterwards kindled between the two Nations; it will not be needless to clear this Matter a little, by adding what the Scots might have alledged against the Proofs, if powerful Motives had not induced them to keep Silence; and what they actually did object, in more favorable Circumstances.

In the first Place, they might say, it was necessary to distinguish two things, which Edward affected to confound in this Memorial; namely, the Superiority of the Forces of the Kings of England, and their frequent Advantages over the Scots, from the pretended Acknowledgment made by the Kings of Scotland, that they held their Crown of the Kings of England. The latter was the main Point in Dispute, and yet the Proofs alledged in the Memorial chiefly relate to the former.

2. The Business was not to prove in general, that the Kings of Scotland were frequently constrained to make disadvantageous Treaties, and afterwards swear to them: The Acts themselves should have been produced, and shewn to contain an express Acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland. It was farther necessary to prove the Continuation of this Acknowledgment by the Homages of the Kings of Scotland upon every new Accession to the Thrones of both Kingdoms, according to the constant Custom practised by Vassals for many Ages since. But this was not done by Edward.

3. When Edgar King of Scotland, owned in his Charter to the Church of Durham that he held his Kingdom of William Rufus; that Acknowledgment did not import a Confession that the Crown of Scotland depended on that of England. It was only a Declaration, that by the Assistance of the King of England he had mounted the Throne of Scotland, seized by an Usurper, as appears in the History.

4. This same Charter, one of Edward's principal Proofs, is affirmed to be a Forgery by the Scotch Writers, and opposed with such strong Chronological Arguments, as seem to demand our Assent.

5. As to what passed between Henry II, and William King of Scotland, it is very true, William did full Homage for his whole Kingdom. But it is no less certain, it was in Consequence of a Treaty, where that Homage was expressly stipulated for the captive King's Liberty. And therefore it is evident, he was not subject to it before, since there was need of binding him to it by a Treaty. And this is what would never have been thought of, unless the War had been undertaken on account of that Homage, which is not fact. Besides this Homage, which was only a Consequence of William's Captivity, was not continued by his Successors; since Richard, Son of Henry, entirely renounced it, as we have seen in the Reign of that Prince.

6. As for the rest of the Proofs, which are much weaker, they are not only taken from English Writers, or Subjects of England, who for the most part lived long after the Events they relate; but are founded on uncertain Expressions, which do not necessarily bear the Sense contended for by Edward.

7. Had Edward no other Proofs to alledge, but the Testimonies of some partial Historians? Why did he not produce the Homages of the ancient Kings of Scotland, as he did that of William to Henry II? If the Thing had been only to prove the Homage for the Earl of Huntingdon, he would have had no occasion to rummage the Historians; his own Records would have supplied him with Proofs. What is the Reason then, that it was more difficult to preserve the Homages for the Kingdom of Scotland? If the King of France could have proved his Sovereignty over Guienne, and the Earl of Montbrian, only by Passages taken from French Authors, there is room to question, whether Edward would have submitted to do him Homage for these two Provinces.

8. The Scots might alledge, that when Henry III demanded the King of Scotland's Assistance against the Earl of Leicester, he owned in express Terms, that the Assistance was given him out of Friendship, and not out of Duty.

9. The same Henry would have had Alexander III, his Son-in-law, do Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland; but Alexander refused it, and would only do it for the Lands he held in England.

10. Edward himself being desirous, that the same Alexander III, his Brother-in-law, should assist at his Coronation, gave him Letters Patents; acknowledging, that the Presence of that Prince was not of Duty, and that he assisted at the Solemnity only out of Friendship, and to do him Honour, without being any ways obliged thereto.

11. When the same Alexander did Homage to Edward, he made an authentick Declaration, that he did not mean to do Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, but only for the Lands he held in England, and his Homage was received with that Limitation.

12. The Scots might say farther, that the Homage done for the Lands in England, though paid by a Scottish King, had no manner of relation to the Kingdom of Scotland. In like manner, the King of England, in doing Homage to the Kings of France, did not intend to make the Kingdom of England dependent on the Crown of France, but only to acknowledge the Dependency of the Lands they held in that Kingdom.

13. Lastly, Homage was frequently paid for Pensions; for Instance, the Earls of Flanders did it to the Kings of England upon that account, as did the Earl of Savoy for a Pension of two hundred Marks. So that barely to shew that the Kings of Scotland did Homage to the Kings of England, was no Proof of the Point in question. It should have been proved, that these Homages were for the Kingdom of Scotland, either by Letters Patents of the Kings of Scotland themselves, or by the Instruments of the Homages well attested, according to the usual Custom. But Edward produced no other Act, but 1291. that of William's forced Homage, renounced by King Richard.

As to the Passages extracted from the Papal Bulls, they could amount to no Proof, since the Scots did not deny that their Kings were Vassals to England for the Earldom of Huntingdon, and other Lands, on the Frontiers. But they denied them to be so for the Kingdom of Scotland, which the Bulls did not affirm.

I say nothing of the Extract taken from the Life of St. John of Beverly, since there is reason to doubt that Edward seriously intended to draw a Proof from so ill-attested, or rather so ridiculous a Miracle, and from a History, whose Author is unknown.

These Answers are not Arguments made by me for the Scots. The greatest part are the same that Boniface VIII used in his Letter to Edward, to dissuade him from any Attempt upon Scotland, as will be seen hereafter. Let us return now to the Decision of the Affair of the Succession, from whence I made this Digression (1).

1292. The Day appointed by Edward being come, all the Candidates, with the fourscore Examiners, repaired to the Burwick, where Edward was present. At the first Meeting, the King of Norway's Ambassadors appeared, and demanded the Crown for the King their Master, Father of the late Queen. Their Petition being received, after a Recognition of the King of England's direct Dominion over Scotland, those of the other Competitors were read, each in its Turn, and the Commissioners began to examine them. But Edward, says the Journal, considering this Examination would be very tedious, and consequently prejudicial to Scotland, took another Course. He moved, and his Motion was approved, that the Rights and Titles of John Baliol and Robert Bruce should be first examined, without Prejudice of the others, which should be afterwards discussed.

The first Question which was put, was, By what Laws and Customs Judgment was to be given? And upon this Edward would have the previous Advice of the Examining Commissioners. It was not possible for them to agree in deciding this Point. After long Debates, they told the King, they could not give him their Advice, without farther Deliberation, and desired him to add to them the four and twenty English, according to the Agreement. This Expedient did not promote the Decision. The English Commissioners reported to the King, that the Scots were to be divided in Opinion, concerning their own Laws, that it was very difficult to settle so disputable a Point. Adding, they durst not themselves, for that Reason, give him any Advice upon so nice a Question. These Difficulties determined Edward to give a longer Time, and appoint the 14th of October following, for the Day of the first Assembly (2).

The Commissioners being met at the Time appointed, Edward asked them these three Questions: 1. By what Laws and Customs Judgment was to be given? 2. How he was to proceed, in case the Customs of England and Scotland should be uncertain, or opposite? 3. Whether Judgment was to be given concerning the Kingdom of Scotland, otherwise than concerning Earldoms, Baronies, and other Fees of the Crown of England? The Delay granted by Edward, had given the Examiners new Light. They who could not agree upon the first Question in August, were unanimous in October. To the first they made Answer; That in case there were any certain Laws or Customs in the King's Dominions, by them he ought to proceed. To the second, That if in his Territories there was no certain Law, he might establish a new one. To the third, That the Kingdom of Scotland was to be judged in the same manner as other indivisible Fees. It is no hard matter to see, that these Preliminary Questions tended only, as is plain from the Answers, to establish Edward's Right of Sovereignty; a Right which he constantly supposed, without allowing it to be contradicted.

Edward, upon these Decisions, ordered Bruce and Baliol to be called, and asked, Whether they had any thing to say, to strengthen the Reasons alleged in their Petitions? They replied, they desired to add something farther by word of Mouth, and Bruce began first. His Reasons were confined to these four. 1. That the Succession of a Crown ought to be settled by the natural Right by which Kings reign, and not by the Laws common to Subjects, and, according to natural Right, the nearest ought to succeed. 2. That for the same Reason, though private Inheritances were divisible, and the eldest had some Privilege by the Laws observed among Subjects, it was not so with regard to a Kingdom, to which the next Heir ought to succeed without any Division. 3. He maintained, that in Scotland, the Crown had been adjudged for the collateral Branch, preferably to the direct, and the Succession, in the Family of the eldest, was not so established, as to be justly prejudicial to him, since in that very Kingdom, Brothers had several times been preferred to Sons. 4. He took it for granted, that though he was in the same degree as Drumgald, he ought however to succeed, because he was the next Male-Heir.

John Baliol answering in his turn, founded his Right on the Genealogy of the Royal Family, and shewed he was descended from the eldest of the Daughters of David Earl of Huntingdon, whereas Bruce sprung only from the second. He replied to the Reasons of his Competitor, and maintained, That the Custom, as well of England as Scotland, was, that the Descendant of the eldest Daughter; though more remote, was preferable to the nearer coming from the younger. As to what Bruce alledged, concerning natural Right, and the Right of Kings, he answered, it belonged to the King of England to decide That, as immemorial Sovereign, and direct Lord of Scotland. As for the Instances, produced by Robert, of Brothers preferred to Sons, he affirmed, it was never done in Scotland, but by way of Usurpation and Violence. That, when such a thing happened, the Kings of England, as Sovereigns, rectified it, by placing the Son on the Throne. To prove his Assertion, he alledged the Example of Edgar, whom William Rufus put in possession of the Crown, usurped by Donald. Lastly, he maintained, that, supposing what Robert advanced was incontestible, it could be no Advantage to him. Indeed, it appeared from thence, that sometimes the nearer was excluded, to make room for the more remote, a Brother being undeniably farther removed than a Son. I should be too tedious if I recited all the Arguments, Answers, and Replies of both Sides. This will suffice, I hope, to shew the Grounds of their Pretensions.

This Affair being thus cleared, and the Reasons of the two Candidates examined, the King put the Question in this Manner: Whether the more Remote by one Degree in Succession, coming from the eldest Sister, ought, according to the Laws and Customs of both Kingdoms, to exclude the Nearer, by a Degree coming from the second Sister?

The Commissioners unanimously answered, That, according to the Laws and Customs of both Kingdoms, the Descendants of the eldest Daughter were to be preferred. It might be justly demanded, to what purpose then was the Discussion of the Preliminary Questions, since the Laws of both Kingdoms were so exprels in favour of the Principal, if it had not been already remarked, that they were subservient to the private Interests of Edward? Notwithstanding the formal Decision of the Commissioners, the King, willing to shew that he acted without Passion and Partiality, caused the same Question to be again long debated in his Presence, and appointed the 6th of November following, to pronounce the final Sentence.

On that Day, Edward solemnly pronounced, that Robert Bruce's Pretensions were ill-grounded, and the Laws allowed him no Right to the Crown of Scotland. But as the Exclusion of Bruce did not necessarily import the Admission of Baliol, since there were other Competitors, the King ordered the Examiners to hear the rest of the Parties. Robert Bruce finding himself excluded by this Sentence, declared, he had another Right which he would prosecute, and justify, in another Form, his Pretensions to part of the Kingdom. Then he presented his Petition, which was admitted.

The Affair between Baliol and Bruce being ended, John Hastings stood up and maintained, That Scotland being a Fee of England, had no more Privileges than other Fees, which were all Partible. He inferred from thence, that the Kingdom of Scotland ought to be divided among the Descendants of the Daughters of David Earl of Huntingdon, the youngest of whom was his Mother. He was immediately seconded by Robert Bruce, who appeared again, and said, He claimed a third part of the Kingdom, as Son and Heir to David's second 1296. greater Loss on this occasion. The burning of their Records (1), by Edward's Order, was to them and their Posterity an irretrievable Loss. Besides these Precautions, Edward took care to secure his Conquest, by placing English Garrison and Governors in all the Castles; and leaving John Warren, Earl of Surrey and Sussex (2), to command in Scotland, returned in Triumph to England.

After seeing the first War with Scotland ended, by the Conquest of the Kingdom, it is time to consider what was done in France; where Edward's Affairs were upon a very different foot. But first it will be necessary to relate the Occasion of the Rupture, between the two Queens of France and England. Since the Treaty between St. Lewis and Henry III. the two Nations had lived in a good Understanding, when a Quarrel between two Persons of little Consideration, gave occasion to the two Monarchs to take Arms. A Norman Pilot, and an English Mariner, quarrelling in a Port of Guienne, where they were landed, the Pilot chanced to be killed. Whether the Magistrates of the Port neglected to bring the Murderer to Justice, or he was not in their Power; the Normans finding, that the Murder of their Countryman was left unpunished, resolved to be revenged. To that end, furnishing an English Vessel, they hung up the Pilot at the Yard-Arm. These Reprisals occasioned others on both Sides, so that the English (3) and Normans, made fierce War upon each other, wherever they met, even to the plundering one another's Ships, when it was in their Power. For some time, it was only a private War, in which the two Kings were not concerned. But some English Ships, happening to meet a Norman Fleet, laden with Wine, carried them to England. The Owners complaining to the King of France, he demanded Restitution of the Ships and Goods, and immediate Satisfaction for the Outrage. Edward not returning speedy Answer, Philip the Fair, who was of an extreme haughty Temper, summoned him to appear in Person before the Court of Peers (4), to answer to the Complaints brought against him.

This Summons was issued in 1294 (5), about the same time Edward cited the King of Scotland, for very trifling Matters, as we have seen. The French Historians say, Edward not appearing, but only sending his Brother Edmund in his stead, Philip, not satisfied therewith, dispatched the Count de Nevers into Guienne, where he seized Bayonnais, with all the rest of the Province. Certainly, it must be surprising, that such a Conquest should cost France so little. Was it possible for that General to become master of Guienne, without forming a Siege, or fighting a Battle; as if it had been an open Country destitute of Castles and Troops for its Defence? This makes me believe, either the French Historians were ignorant of what passed on this Occasion, or did not think proper to mention it. But what does not appear in their Histories, is fully cleared in the Collection of the Publick Acts, lately printed in England, and which I have so often quoted. And therefore I hope, the Reader will not be displeased to see the Particulars (6).

Edward being summoned before the Peers, as was said, did not think proper to appear in Person. He sent Prince Edmund his Brother to Paris, to answer for him; with Orders to avoid, as much as possible, engaging him in a War with France. Accordingly, the Prince was fully empowered, to give the King of France all the Satisfaction, he could reasonably desire (7). Edmund found the French Monarch extremely incensed, and full of Threats. After several Instance to enter into Treaty, his Negotiation seeming to him entirely fruitless, he resolved to return Home. Just as he was ready to depart, the two Queens, namely, Mary of Brabant, Widow of Philip the Hardy, and Isabella of Navarre, Wife of the present King, intreated him to renew the Negotiation with them. The great desire they expressed of procuring a firm Peace between the two Kings, and Edmund's Instructions from the King his Brother, easily induced him to consent to the Proposal. The two Queens represented to him, that Philip was extremely offended at the Affronts received from Edward's Subjects; and particularly from certain Persons of Guienne, against whom he was incited to the last Degree: That therefore it was impossible to come to a good Agreement, unless a reasonable Satisfaction was given him. They added, as the King's Honour was concerned in this Affair, there was no other way to appease him, but by Edward's making him a publick Reparation, to save the World, that he disclaimed what was done by his Subjects. To that end, they proposed that John, Talbot, Thomas, Paynel, and Piers, and Morfington, together with the Person concerned, should be delivered to Philip. But as this Satisfaction seemed unreasonable, they intreated to Edmund, that it was only for Form sake; and Philip would engage to restore the Towns and Persons, upon their own Request. Moreover they promised, that as soon as the King's Honour was satisfied by this Reparation, he should revoke the Summons, and give Edward a Satisfaction to come to him at Avignon, where he would receive his Homage. Edmund consented to all these Proposals, provided the two Queens would sign them in writing, and promise with an Oath, that the Particulars agreed upon, should be punctually performed. This Treaty, which was signed by the two Queens, and for the King of France's Honour was to be kept Secret, was sent to Edward, who seemed very well satisfied. He was chiefly Intent upon what concerned Scotland, and in all likelihood his many Summons to Babel on trifling Occasions, were intended only to cause him to rebel, in order to have an opportunity to punish him. Besides, whilst this Affair was negotiating at Paris, he made himself master of Scotland. So that, as a War with France, at such a juncture, could not but greatly embarrass him, he was very glad to give Philip a seeming Reparation, which in the mean was no prejudice to him. Finding therefore, the French King was contented with an appearance of Reparation, he resolved to give it him more fully than was even desired, in order to be more sure of a Peace with France, so necessary for him. To that end, he gave Edmund power to deliver to the King of France all Guienne, with its Metropolis, and sent positive Orders to the Seneschal to obey the Prince's Command, without any Exception. Edmund acquainting the King of France with the Orders he had received, declared he was ready to execute them; but on condition that, in the presence of credible Witnesses, the King would promise with his own Mouth, to perform the Articles signed by the two Queens. Philip was very willing to give him that Satisfaction, and going into a certain Room attended by the Duke of Burgundy, gave his Royal Word, before the same Duke, the two Queens, Blanche of Navarre, Wife of Edmund, and the English Ambassadors, to perform that Treaty. At the same time, he revoked with his own Mouth Edward's Summons, and caused the Revocation to be published in open Hall, by the Bishops of Orleans. Edmund then sent his eldest son, who had been ordered the Seneschal of Guienne (8), to deliver the Duke to the Person, that should be empowered by the King of France. Ralph de Nesle, Count de France, was commissioned to take possession of Guienne in Philip's Name. The Seneschal would have proceeded with Caution, and not delivered up the Province, but on the Terms of the Treaty, of which Edmund had informed him. But the Count refused to be tied to any Conditions, alleging he knew nothing of the Treaties between the two Kings, and was ordered only to take possession of Guienne in his Master's Name. Then he demanded the Persons agreed upon, and sent them to Paris.

All the Articles being more than performed on the part of England, Edmund demanded the Restitution of Guienne, and the Persons, stipulated in the secret Treaty. To which it was answered, that his Demand should be examined in the King's Council. At the same time Philip sent him word, not to be surprized, if he gave him a harsh Answer before the Council, on account of some Members who were not in the Secret; but as soon as they should be gone, he would give him entire Satisfaction. Edmund relying upon his word, appeared before the Council, where Philip was present, and demanded the Restitution of Guienne, to which that Monarch roughly replied, He would not restore it. This Answer not surprizing the Prince, who expected it, he withdrew into the next Room, waiting for the Performance of the King's Promise, and was left there some time, without any other Answer. At length the Bishops of Orleans and Tournay, came and told him, it was in vain to wait 1296. any longer, for the King would not be solicited any more upon that Affair. Some days after, Philip came to the Parliament, without acquainting Edmund, and ordered the King of England to be publicly cited, to appear and answer to the Articles exhibited in the Summons. Edmund not being then in the Palace, Hugh de Vere, and John de Lucy, Edward's Ambassadors, entered, and said, they could not have imagined this Affair would be decided by way of Justice, but according to the Treaty, especially as the Summons was revoked. This Excuse not being admitted, they were dismissed; and though they desired only till the next Day, to consult with the King's Brother, they could not obtain that Delay. So the Court decreed the Confiscation of Guienne to the King of France (1).

This is the Substance of a Memorial in the Collection of the Publick Acts, where Prince Edmund himself gives an account of this Affair, and the manner it was transacted, from the beginning of his Negotiation. It may indeed be objected, that it comes from one of the Parties, and consequently his Testimony is not to be credited. But, besides the Simplicity and Plainness of the Memorial, the Conquest of Guienne, without Sieges and Battles, makes the Relation very probable. Moreover, we find, in the Collection above-mentioned, several of Edward's Letters, complaining of being deceived by the King of France. There is one, among the rest, directed to the Prelates and Barons of Guienne, wherein he excuses himself from making a Treaty with France, without their Advice; and tells them, he is deceived as much or more than themselves (2). This is further evident from the disclaiming of the Homage he had done to Philip, in the following Words:

Our Ambassadors shall say to the King of France these Words:

Sire, Our Lord the King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitain, did you Homage conditionally; namely, according to the Form of the Peace made between your Ancestors and his, which you have not kept. Moreover, that all Differences between your Subjects and his might be ended, a secret Treaty was made between you and my Lord Edmund his Brother, as you may remember, containing certain Articles which you have not performed, though he has done more than was promised on his part. After that, he required you twice by his said Brother, and a third time by the Peers of France, and other Great Men of your Kingdom, to restore him his Land of Guienne, and to deliver those of his Subjects whom you detain in Prison, which you have refused. And therefore it seems to him, that you no longer count him your Vassal; and accordingly he refuses to be so for the future (3).

How great sower Edward's Vexation might be, to see himself thus cheated by Philip, he chose rather to leave Guienne in the Hands of that Prince, than relinquish the War with Scotland, which to him seemed of greater Importance. Besides, he was sensible, before he engaged in a War with France, it would be necessary to prevent the Diversion, the Scots might make on the Frontiers of the North. For this Reason he was contented with sending his Brother Edmund into Guienne, with few Troops (4), his sole Aim being to keep Philip employed in those Parts, for fear of his assisting the Scots. Edward not intending a vigorous prosecution of the War in Guienne, where he had only Bayonne, and some neighbouring Places; it may well be thought what passed in those Parts cannot be very considerable. And yet, the French boast of gaining two Battles, one under the Earl of Valois, and the other under the Earl of Artois. But these Actions could not be very important, considering the small Number of Edmund's Forces. The Truth is, France was obliged to keep there a considerable Army, because she had to oppose, not only the English, but the Revolts of the Navies, who were extremely displeased with having a new Master. The Superiority of the Earl of Valois's Forces, obliged Edmund to shut himself up in Bayonne, where he died in 1296 (5). The Earl of Lincoln (6), who took the Command of the English Troops, besieging Dacry, was forced to make a hasty Retreat, upon the Approach of the Earl of Artois, who was advancing to raise the Siege. Perhaps he received on this occasion some little loss, which the French call a Battle (7). However, I do not think it necessary to dwell any longer on the War of Guienne, since it produced no remarkable Event (8).

It was not in Gascogne that Edward intended to exert his utmost against France. He perceived it very difficult to recover a Province so remote from England, and where he had no other Place but Bayonne. His Design was to attack Philip in Flanders, where the Situation of Affairs seemed to promise him better Success. The Earl of Flanders's Circumstances obliged him to seek for Protection against France; and he could find none so near or so ready as that of the King of England, who burned with desire to be revenged. The occasion of the Earl's Difference with Philip was this.

In the Year 1284, Guy, the Earl was called; quarrelled with the Men of Ghent, on account of the Government of their City, which they pretended he had nothing to do with. In the Reign of Philip the Hardy, this Affair was brought before the Parliament of Paris, who passed Sentence in favour of the Earl, and fined the Magistrates. Guy took this occasion to be as troublesome as possible to the Inhabitants of that large City, which they highly resented. When Philip the Fair ascended the Throne, Things had another Face. Philip, perceiving the Quarrel between the Earl of Flanders and the People of Ghent, offered him a favorable opportunity to make an advantage of their Discord, was unwilling to neglect it. Wherefore, he privately sent word to the Magistrates of Ghent, that if they would renew their Process against the Earl, he was ready to do them Justice. This was sufficient to engage the City of Ghent to renew the Quarrel. The Affair being once more brought before the Parliament of Paris, the Authority of the thirty nine Magistrates or Governors, abolished by the former Decree, was re-established in Ghent. The Earl was extremely offended, that Philip should make it his Business to plague him, by restoring to the City a Power, which to him was so odious. He durst not however show his Resentment; but resolved to take measures to strengthen himself against him, regarding him as an Enemy, whose Design he ought to try to prevent. Some time after, he set Robert de Békun his Son to work, who, by secret Intimations, persuaded the Cities of Flanders to fortify certain Places, contrary to the Tenor of the Treaties with France; assuring them, they would meet with no opposition from the Earl's Father. Guy's Aim was to let the Cities at variance with France, lest Philip should excite them against him. Philip was informed of the share the Earl had in this Affair; but, as he was then otherwise employed, did not think proper to discover his Resentment, either against the Cities which had violated the Treaties, or against their Adviser. Mean while, his very Silence made the Earl sensible, he was to expect an attack some other Time. Things continued thus for some Years. Philip dissembled his Anger, and Guy continually thought of means to prevent its Effects.

During these Transactions, the Rupture between France and England happened to break out. Though Edward used all possible means to avoid a War, by the Negotiation at Paris, he believed that whatever fell out, he ought to secure the Assistance of the Earl of Flanders, whose Discontent was no secret to him. To that end, he demanded his eldest Daughter in marriage for Prince Edward his Son, judging it an infallible means to bind him strongly to his Interests. This Negotiation, though secret, came to Philip's Knowledge, and gave him great Uneasiness. But he concealed it, lest by showing it he should deprive himself of the means to prevent an Alliance so prejudicial to France. To compass his ends, he pretended Ignorance, and upon some Pretence drawing Guy and his Countess to Paris, kept them Prisoners. It was a sort of Favour that he gave them their Liberty, on condition they delivered their Daughter in Hostage, and promised to break their Alliance with Edward, on pain of Excommunication.

1297. Edward forms a League with France. Guy was no sooner in his Dominions but he tried all sorts of ways to recover his Daughter from Philip. But it was not possible to succeed. Philip was too apprehensive of the Earl's Union with England, voluntarily to let go the Pledge he had in his Power.

1297. Edward forms a League with France. Whilst these things passed, the Affairs of Scotland, which wholly employed Edward, afforded him neither Leisure nor Opportunity to think of his projected War against Philip. But as soon as Matters were as he wished them, he turned all his Thoughts to Revenge. Philip's fraudulent Proceeding, being an Injury not to be easily forgotten, he had put a great Restraint on himself, in delaying this long to make him repent of it. However as he was going to deal with a potent Adversary, it was necessary to have a powerful Army, which England alone was not able to supply. Wherefore he sought means to form beyond Sea a strong League against France, and though it seemed a difficult Matter, failed not to accomplish it. Besides the Earl of Flanders whom he gained without Trouble, Adolphus of Nassau, newly elected Emperor, Albert Duke of Austria, the Archbishop of Cologne, and several other Princes of Germany, the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Holland, Juliers, and Luxemburg were engaged in the League, by the great Sums Edward was to furnish them with (1). All these Princes, proud of their Number and Strength, sent Carrels of Defiance to Philip, of whom he was offended with none so much as the Earl of Flanders; who being his Vassal, boldly told him, he would no longer acknowledge him for a Sovereign.

Whilst Philip was preparing to repulse this Attack, Edward took the side of the Clergy. He wanted extremely, on account of his Engagements with the confederate Princes. To that end he assembled the Parliament at St. Edmundsbury (2), and obtained an Aid of the eighth Part of the Moveables (3) of the Cities and Burroughs, and a twelfth of the rest of the Laity. This Example could not influence the Clergy. They pretended they were exempted from giving Aids to the King, by Virtue of a Bull sent the last Year by Boniface VIII. to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which he had kept without making it publick. By this Bull all Ecclesiasticks were expressly forbid to pay any Tax to secular Princes without the Consent of the Holy See. The Clergy's Refusal extremely provoked the King. Nevertheless before he proceeded to violent Methods (4), he caused it to be represented to the principal Members, That since they possessed Fees in the Kingdom, and enjoyed the Protection of the Laws, as well as the rest of his Subjects, it was but reasonable they should contribute to the publick Expenses. But these Remonstrances were ineffectual. When he found he could not prevail, he commanded all the Lay-Fees possessed by the Clergy to be seized, and their whole Body to be thrown out of the Protection of the Laws; expressly forbidding his Judges to do them Justice, in any case whatever. So bold a Step astonished the Clergy, who, since the Beginning of the Monarchy had never experienced the like Resolution, in any King of England. If Edward had been like his Father or Grandfather, perhaps that powerful Body would have found, in the People's Discontent, Means to make the King repent of his Boldness. But as they perceived it would be difficult to stir up the People, they did not think proper to exert their Endeavours, which probably would be to no purpose. So that some speedily compounding with the King for the fifth Part of their Goods, their Example drew in the rest. The Archbishop of Canterbury was treated more severely, as he was not only the first Adverser of the Clergy's Refusal, but persisted in it more obstinately than the others (5). The King ordered all his Estates to be seized, with the Revenues of the Monasteries of his Diocese, and committed the Management of them to Officers, who left the Monks no more than was absolutely necessary for their Subsistence. In all Appearance, this was to punish them, for too warmly adhering to their Archbishop. The King's Resolution at length made that Prelate stoop, who to recover his Sovereign's Favour, gave him a fourth Part (6) of his Goods. Thus the Clergy when they meet with vigorous Princes, are as submissive, as they are haughty, when they have to deal with those that are scrupulous and weak.

ty, when they have to deal with those that are scrupulous and weak.

Shortly after, on much the same Occasion, the Lords showed more Steadiness than the Prelates, though against the same Prince. To execute his grand Projects, he assembled the Nobility at Salisbury (7), on purpose to see exactly what Troops each Baron could furnish him with (8). His Intention was to make a powerful Diversion in Guienne, whilst he pressed the Enemy on the Side of Flanders. But it was difficult to find Lords that would serve, but where he commanded in Person. Every one desired to be excused serving in Guienne, though they were willing to furnish the Troops. Edward, not satisfied with their Excuses, threatened to give their Lands to such as would be more obedient. These Menaces raised great Commotions among the Nobles. They were far from thinking their Lands at the King's Disposal. Humphrey Beaufort High-Constable, and Hugh Bigod Earl of Norfolk and Marbhall of England, more bold than the rest, plainly told the King, they were ready to follow him where he commanded in Person, and not otherwise. The Marshall added, he was willing to lead the Van-Guard under the King, as his Office obliged him, but would not serve under any other, to which none had a Right to compel him. The King answered in a great Passion, he would make him go. To which the other replied, he should not. By the eternal God, said the King then, in great Rage, You shall march or be hanged. By the eternal God, replied the Earl, I will neither march nor be hanged; and immediately withdrew without returning to Court any more.

Edward had seen, in the King his Father's Reign, frequent and fatal Instances of the Insolence of the Barons, and he knew too well their great Union in the defence of their Privileges, to hazard his Reputation and Quiet in a War against them. A Quarrel of that Nature must have been very prejudicial to him, as well as to the whole Kingdom. The least Inconvenience that could happen, was, losing the opportunity of being revenged of the King of France. As the Barons stood disposed, it was scarce to be doubted, but they would have all joined against him, if he had undertaken openly to chastise the Insolence of those that dared to withstand him to his Face. He had still further Reason to be confirmed in this belief, when he heard that, dreading his Repentment, they began to raise Troops in their Defence, in case he designed to attack them (9). Without much Penetration, it was easy to see, they were supported. These Considerations induced the King to hide his Repentment till he could show it effectually. Besides, he was unwilling to lose the opportunity of going into Flanders, where the Wants of the Earl his Ally incessantly called him. However, it was not long before he found a favorable Juncture to correct the Boldness of the two Earls, by turning them out of their Posts, because they refused to do something belonging to their Offices, for fear of falling into his Hands. He was very near repenting what he had done. Just as he was going to embark, he received from the Bishops, Earls, Barons, and Commons of the Realm, a long Remonstrance, containing a List of the Grievances of the Nation, and several Violations of the Great Charter. This Proceeding made him sensible, he was to act with Deliberation, for fear of provoking a Nation, which seemed ready to take Fire upon the first occasion. He returned therefore a very gracious Answer to the Remonstrance, and promised upon his Honour, to redress, at his return, all the Abuses complained of. He desired the Nobles to be quiet during his Absence, assuring them, he would give them entire Satisfaction. As it was no less necessary to appease the People, exasperated by the secret Practices of the two Earls, he published a Proclamation to justify his Conduct, and show his Reasons for turning out these two great Officers. Amongst other Things, he said in this Proclamation, he was informed his People were made to believe, that he refused to receive Remonstrances, tending to the Good of the Publick, which he affirmed to be false. He expressed likewise great Sorrow for having put his Subjects to vast Expenses for the Maintenance of

The Prince his Son, whom he left Regent (2), assembling the Parliament (3), and obtaining a large Subsidy (4), confirmed King John's two Charters, by an authentic Act, signed in Flanders by the King himself, and sealed with the Great Seal which he had carried with him (5). We may observe in the History of England several of the like Instances. I mean, that the Kings, who have dealt gently with their Subjects, and interfered with Moderation to their Complaints, have seldom failed to appease them, provided they have not, like Henry III, affected continually to deceive them and break their Word. On the contrary, such as have acted too haughtily, have generally brought themselves into great Trouble; of which we have seen very remarkable Examples in some of the foregoing Reigns.

Philip was employed at home in making Preparations to support the League formed against France, Philip was no less careful to provide against the impending Assault. He strenuated himself by Alliance with the Kings of Castile and Arragon, and raised a powerful Army, whilst Jean Queen of Navarre his Wife, assembled her own Forces to assist him. Champagne, which belonged to that Prince, was first attacked, by the Earl of Bar one of Edward's Allies, who ravaged that Province from one end to the other. But the sequel of this Undertaking was as fatal to the Earl, as the Beginning was prosperous. Upon the Queen's Approach, who was advancing to defend her Country, the Earl, seized with Fear, and unable to fight, or retreat, was forced to surrender to that Prince, who sent him Prisoner to Paris.

Mean while, the confederate Princes made no haste to send their Troops into Flanders. Adolphus of Nassau, detained by Troubles which Philip had raised him in Germany, or as some affirm, by Presents, could not, or would not perform what he had promised. The Duke of Luftria was bribed by the same means, and the Dukes of Brabant and Luxemburg, the Earls of Guelders and Beaumont, followed their Example. Philip improving this Advantage, entered Flanders at the head of three thousand Men, and immediately laid down before Lisle. Guy, who impatiently waited for the English Supplies, was not able to withstand the King of France, not having half the Forces he was made to expect. All he could do was to try to break Philip's Measures by a Diversion, under the Conduct of the Duke of Juliers. When the King of France heard, this General had taken the Field, he detached the Earl of Artois, who meeting him near Furnes, gave him Battle, and put his Army to rout. The Duke of Juliers was slain in the Fight, and the Earl of Artois lost his eldest Son. This Defeat caused Guy not to stir from Ghent and Bruges, where he expected Edward. Besides he was in great Perplexity by reason of the Divisions in his Country. There were two Parties in Flanders, one, called Porte-lys, was in the Interests of France, and the other for the Earl.

Edward arrived at last (6), after having been long expected, but with Forces little proportioned to the great Undertaking (7); because he depended upon the Allies, who were not so good as their Word. At his entry into Bruges, he found the whole City in Confusion, by reason of the Animosity of the two forementioned Factions. It was with difficulty, that he at length appeased the Commotions of the City, by granting the Inhabitants certain Privileges, concerning their Commerce with England. After that he came to Ghent, where he found the same Divisions. So that, as on his Part, he brought not with him all the Forces he had promised, he himself saw with Vexation how little able the Earl of Flanders was, to supply the Troops he had been made to expect. The Flemings were divided concerning the War. Some approved it, whilst others maintained it to be destructive to their Country, and undertaken by their Prince for his own, or the King of England's, Interests. Whilst Edward was employed in composing these Differences, so prejudicial to his Affairs, Philip, after a three Months Siege, made himself Master of Lisle. When he was in possession of this Place, he easily reduced Dunay, Courtrey, and some other Towns in the Neighbourhood. Then he marched to Bruges, which surrendered without Resistance. He had formed the Project of burning the English Fleet, which lay at Anchor at Dam. But the Earl of Valst, who had taken this Expedition upon him, not being secret enough in his Preparations, found the English Ships failed.

All Edward's Measures were broken, by the Treachery of his chief Allies, who forsook him after taking his Money. The Supplies he could expect from the Earl of Flanders, were uncertain and inconsiderable, by reason of the Porte-lys Faction, which opposed all Resolves any way detrimental to France. His own Troops were too few to enable him to withstand his Enemy's Forces. Besides, fresh Commotions in Scotland, rendered his Presence necessary in his Kingdom, where too he was not without Fear, that his Absence might occasion some Troubles. All these Considerations together, induced him to seek some Expedient to get off, without being obliged to abandon the Earl of Flanders, whom he had engaged in his Quarrel. He found no better than to desire a Truce, which was granted him solely upon the Account of the King of Sicily, and the Earl of Savoy; who used their Interest for him. By this Truce, (which was to last but till the Epiphany for Guienne, and till St. Andrew's Day (8), only for Flanders,) Philip continued in possession of the Places he had taken. Probably, this Condition served to prolong the Truce for two Years. Philip being very well pleased peaceably to enjoy his Conquests. How hasty soever Edward might be to settle Matters in Scotland, he spent the rest of the Winter at Ghent, to try to unite the Inhabitants of that powerful City. He hoped by that means to have a considerable Assistance from thence, when the Truce was expired. During his stay, he was in danger of his Life, by a Sedition of the Citizens, who were resolved to murder all the English. It is said he owed his Life to the Generosity of a Flemish Knight, of the Porte-lys Faction, who by his Pains and Intreaties stopped the Fury of the mutinous People. His danger giving him reason to dread some fresh Insult, he relinquished his Undertaking and returned to his Dominions.

Such was the Success of Edward's Expedition into Flanders. The powerful League, which seemed ready to swallow up France, served only to drain the Treasure of the Projector; and convince him, how difficult it would be to recover by Force the Country lost by his Imprudence. To be disappointed in his Projects, was not much: That is a misfortune to which the greatest Men are sometimes liable. But here was more: He could not extricate himself out of the Difficulties he had run into, without greatly injuring his Honour. Notwithstanding his promise to protect the Earl of Flanders to the end, he deserted him however, as will be seen hereafter. Let us return now to Scotland, which is to be the chief Subject of the rest of this Reign.

Though Edward had conquered Scotland, he had not subdued the Hearts of the Scots, who bore with Impatience the Yoke imposed on them by Force. When they saw Edward employed in Flanders, they took that opportunity to rise under the Conduct of William Wallace, a Man of no illustrious Family, and of a still meaner Fortune; but of a very great Genius (1). This generous Scot, though of little Authority among his Countrymen, took upon him to raise his Country out of the Gulph of Misery wherein it was plunged; whilst the Persons of the highest Rank, divided by Factions, or adhering to the Conqueror, were striving who should most perpetuate its Slavery. The Scotch Writers give this famous Man a Character, which equals him to the greatest Heroes, and are at a loss for Words lofty enough to express his Merit. Wallace then, though scarce known in Scotland, resolving to retrieve the Liberty of his Country, assembled a small number of Troops for that purpose. How inconsiderable soever this Body was, of which he had the Command, he made so wonderful a Progress, that one does not know which to admire most, either the Boldness or the first Success, of his Enterprize. All that longed for Liberty, finding there was a Man hardy enough to head them, lifted in Crowds under his Banner, and quickly formed a considerable Army. With this Aid, Wallace attacked the Places possessed by the English, and whose Garrisons were weak, because Edward had wanted his Troops in Flanders. By his Severity to those that fell into his Hands, he struck such Terror into the rest, that scarce any Place held out to Extremity, for fear of being liable to the same Treatment. By this means he recovered in a very short Space, all the Towns taken by the English, and left them only the single Town of Berwick (2). These prosperous Successes bred in his Army so great Admiration for his Bravery, that, without standing upon the usual Formalities, he was declared Regent of the Kingdom. Edward, who was then in Flanders, hearing of Wallace's Progress (3), halted the Conclusion of the Treaty above-mentioned, and returned into England (4), bent upon severely punishing the Revolt of the Scots.

Before he undertook this Expedition, it was absolutely necessary to settle two Affairs of equal Importance. The first was, to find some way to make Peace with France, lest Philip should assist the Scots. The second, to give some Satisfaction to the People, as he had promised to do after his Return. He found no better Method to accomplish his first Aim, than by getting Philip to agree to refer their Difference to Boniface VIII, who was not yet at variance with that Prince as he was afterwards. Philip closing with this Proposal, the two Monarchs left their Contests to the Pope's Arbitration, not as Head of the Church, but as a private Person under the Name of Benedict Cajetan.

This Affair being like to succeed, the Second was to be thought of. In order to gain the Affection of his Subjects, Edward called a Parliament (5), and, of his own accord, confirmed the Great Charter (6). It is true, he insisted very much upon having this Clause inserted in this Confirmation, Saving the Prerogatives of the Crown. But finding the Parliament opposed it with great Warmth, he chose to desist, which had a very good Effect upon the People.

Edward being thus freed from the Uneasiness these two Affairs gave him, put himself at the Head of a powerful Army, and advancing into the middle of Scotland, met his Enemies at Falkirk. The two Armies were entangled so near together, that the English hearing a great Shout in the Enemies Camp, ran to their Arms in the utmost Hurry, believing they were going to be attacked. The King also would mount his Horse: But as he was putting his Foot in the Stirrup, the Horse, frightened by the Noise that was made, threw him on the Ground, and with a Kick broke two of his Ribs. This sad Accident hindered him not from being in the Battle which quickly ensued, and commanding with the same presence of Mind as if he had been unhurt. The Battle proved Bloody, and withal very fatal to the Scots; who, accomding to some Writers, lost three-score thousand Men: But this is not very likely. Others who reduce the Number to ten Thousand, are perhaps as wide of the Truth (7). Be this as it will, the Loss of the Scots, was so great, that for a long while they were not able to hold up their Head. Wallace with the Remains of his Army, retired behind the northern Fens, where it was not possible to follow him. Mean time, Edward improving his Victory, retook all the Places of Strength, with the same ease he had lost them. So he may be said on this occasion to conquer Scotland a second time. After necessary Orders for the Preservation of the Kingdom, he marched back into England, where he was called by important Affairs.

Wallace was not then in a condition to take advantage of Edward's Absence. He had not only lost his Army, but moreover plainly perceived the Jealousy of the Scotch Lords was one of the principal Causes of his Defeat. His Virtues, instead of filling them with Emulation, made them apprehensive of his aspiring to the Crown. In this Belief, they chose rather, that their Country should groan under perpetual Bondage, than see themselves reduced to do Homage to one of so inferior a Birth. These Suspensions must needs have been spread among the Nobility, since Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, Son of the Candidate to the Crown, upbraided Wallace upon that Score. This Earl, who served in Edward's Army, being, on the Day of the Battle of Falkirk, in pursuit of Wallace who was retreating, and stopped by a little River, which the Scots had just passed, sent to desire him to come and speak with him on the opposite Bank. Wallace consenting to it, Robert represented to him, "That he was ruining himself by his Ambition. That there was no likelihood of his resisting the Forces of the King of England; and though he might flatter himself with such Hopes, the great Men of the Kingdom would never be brought to own him for King." Wallace replied, "That in taking up Arms, he was not in the least swayed by Ambition: That he acknowledged himself too unworthy of the Throne, to dare to look so high; but that his only Aim was to free his Country, which the great Men of the Realm suffered to perish by their Cowardice." It is said this Reply made such an Impression on Bruce's Mind, that he burst out into Tears. It is further added, that he resolved from that very Moment, to use his utmost Endeavours to free Scotland from the Slavery she groaned under.

Mean time, Wallace, knowing how much the great Men's Jealousy of him, was prejudicial to the Interests of the Kingdom, resigned the Regency, and acted only as a private Person. He ceased not however, to the utmost of his Power, and upon all Occasions, to endeavour to set his Country free. Some time after Edward left Scotland, they who had any remains of Affection for their Country, chose Campy for Regent. But this Regency was of little Consequence, since it gave him Authority only over a small Part of the Kingdom, and a few confused Troops, escaped from the late Battle.

Upon Edward's return into England (8), he used his utmost Endeavours to promote the Negotiation, now in the Hands of the Pope, for the Restitution of Guiana (9). Since he despaired of regaining that Province by Arms, the Alliance of the Earl of Flanders was a Burden to him; the Protection he had promised him, being a perpetual Obstacle to the Conclusion of the Peace. He resolved therefore to abandon his Ally, and from thenceforward all Difficulties began to vanish. The unfortunate Earl, forsaken by the King of England, and on the other Side, pressed by the Earl of Valois, who commanded the French Army in Flanders, knew not which way to turn himself. In this wretched Situation, he was perfwaded at length to deliver himself up to that Prince, who promised to con-

And because the Confirmation of the two Charters had been done beyond Sea, the Earls of Hereford and Northampton desired, that the said Confirmation should be now renewed: The Earls of Surrey, Warwick, and Ralph de Mont-barn, promised, in the King's Name, that it should be done, at his return from Scotland; which was accordingly performed, in a Parliament holden at London, in Lent, 1300. (8) After the Battle of Falkirk, King Edward intended to march further into Scotland, but was forced to alter his Resolution, because the Country being entirely wasted, and his Fleet not arriving with Provisions, he was obliged, a great Stormy weather being then on, to return. He retired thence to Berwick, where he was, the Countess of Hereford, being taken by the way the Carles of Alze and Longueville in shewdale: And from thence came to Carlisle, and afterwards to Lancaster, where he held a Great Council in the beginning of September, and bestowed on several great Men of England new Rewards, the Estates of such as, with Noblemen as he had late revolted against him. From thence he removed to Timmuth, and thence to Chester. 1300. Breviary, where he was, the Countess of Hereford, being taken by the way the Carles of Alze and Longueville in shewdale: And from thence came to Carlisle, and afterwards to Lancaster, where he duct him to Paris, that he might treat in Person with the King, and in case he could not within a twelve Month obtain a Peace, to permit him to be at Liberty to return into his Dominions. But Philip not thinking himself bound by his Brother's Word, kept the Earl Prisoner (1).

The two vassals Truce between France and England began about to expire, the Ambassadors of the two Kings met at Montreuil near the Sea, where the Pope sent there his Sentence of Arbitration: The Substance whereof was as follows, that Edouard should again take possession of Guienne, and, to restore Union between the two Kings, should marry Margaret Sister of Philip (2), and that Isabella Daughter (3) of the same Philip, should be given to the Prince of Wales, Son of Edouard. It was said also in the Sentence, that John Balliol, formerly King of Scotland, should be delivered into the hands of the Pope's Nuncio, to be kept where he should think proper. The Plenipotentiaries of the two Crowns signed this Sentence: But as there were several things to be adjusted in order to put it in execution, they agreed upon a Truce, which afterwards was frequently prolonged before the Treaty of Peace was signed. Mean while Balliol was delivered to the Bishop of Vincennes, the Pope's Nuncio, who committed him to the Custody of some French Bishops.

When the King of Scotland heard that a Treaty was negotiating at Montreuil between France and England, he sent Deputies to Philip to intreat him to cause Scotland to be included. The Juncture appeared favorable. Edward earnestly wished to recover Guiney by a Treaty, not thinking himself in condition to regain it any other way. Probably, therefore, he would, upon that Consideration, grant Scotland tolerable Terms, if the King of France would seriously endeavour to obtain them. And indeed, Philip tried at first to persuade Edward to leave Scotland in quiet. But the moment he proposed it, he found it impossible to procure any thing, but some little Advantages, which too they would be obliged to purchase, by a formal Acknowledgment of the Power that held them in Slavery. Edward was in possession of Scotland, where he scarce met with any farther Opposition. So that, to propose his granting a Peace to that Kingdom, was in effect to desire him to relinquish his Conquest. On the other hand, he could not grant a separate Peace to the Regent and his Adherents, without leaving in Scotland a Power independent of his own. All therefore that Philip could obtain was a seven Months Truce, for such as could not think of bearing his Yoke. If we believe the Scotch Historians, this Truce was ill kept by England. But it may be this is only to justify Cromwell's Resolution to break it. However that be, the Regent assembled the Lords whom he knew to be well-affected to their Country, and represented to them the sad Condition it was reduced to. He told them, if they gave Edward time to secure his Conquest, he would take such Measures, as would render ineffectual all future Endeavours of the Recovery of their Liberty. That, as soon as the few Remains of the Scots which still resisted, were subdued, he would entirely reduce the miserable Kingdom to a perfect Slavery. That this Design would now have been executed, had it not been retarded by the Truces procured them by France. That there was therefore no time to lose, and it was necessary speedily to resolve to make a generous Effort for the Recovery of their Liberty, or to leave their Country in perpetual Slavery. Then he shewed them with what Ease they might free themselves from the Yoke, whilst Edward depended on their Weakness; and the Winter Season offered them Advantages, which they could never more expect when once it was passed. These Remonstrances produced the Effect he promised himself. The Lords, fond of Liberty and impatient of their Servitude, resolved with one accord to rise in Arms, and every one laboured to inspire the People with the same Resolution. It was not difficult to succeed, for the meaner sort were still more exasperated against the English than the Nobles, because they were worse treated. In a short time, the whole Kingdom rose, and it was not possible for the English Garrisons to put a Stop to so general a Revolt. All the Inhabitants of the Towns as well as of the Country taking Arms the same Day and Hour, 129.

the Garrisons found themselves attacked all at once, both within and without, with such Rage and Fury, that there was no possibility of resisting. In a word, they were reduced to the necessity of desiring leave to depart the Kingdom, otherwise they could not avoid being cut in Pieces.

Edward inraged that there was no end of these things, 1300.
 raised an Army with all possible speed, and as soon as he ^{the King} the Sea-ford would permit, entered a third time (4), Sword in ^{the King} hand, that unfortunate Kingdom. The Scotch Army, which ^{the King} consisted only of ill-armed and undisciplined Militia, ^{the King} not being able to stand against Edward, would have retired ^{the King} upon his Approach. But he followed them so briskly, that ^{the King} being at length overtaken and obliged to engage, they ^{the King} were entirely routed. Historians affirm, that the Fate of ^{the King} Scotland would have been determined that Day, if the ^{the King} English could have pursued their Enemies through the Fens ^{the King} which were known to the Natives, but which the Conquerors durst not venture to pass (5).

The Scots upon this Defeat, despairing of making any further Resistance, had recourse to Intreaties and Submissions. They humbly desired the King to give them leave to redeem their Lands with Money, and to restore their King, on what Conditions he pleased. But he refused both these Requests. This Cruelty caused them to seek means to ease their Misery, by putting themselves under the Pope's Protection, to whom they sent Ambassadors with an Offer of the Sovereignty of their Country. Boniface VIII, whose Ambition is well known, immediately accepted the Offer. He had been used to proceed very haughtily with Christian Princes, imagining they were implicitly to submit to his Will, and that his Authority reached to Temporal as well as Spirituals. In this Belief, his bare Letter was sufficient to cause Edward to quit all his Pretensions to Scotland. In the beginning of this Brief, which was as follows, the Pope took for granted a thing that had never been heard of.

*BONIFACE, Servant of Servants, &c. To our be- The Pope's loved Son Edward, illustrious King of England, Greet- Bull to ing and Apostolical Benediction. Edward.
A. Pub.*

We know, Dear Son, and Experience has often convinc'd us, how great your devout Affection is for the Church of Rome, who uphold: you in the Bowels of Love. We know, I say, your ardent Zeal and Reverence for her, and your Readiness to obey her Orders. This gives us a firm Hope and entire Confidence that your Royal Highness will receive our Words in good part, diligently listen to them, and effectually put them in execution. Your Royal Highness may have heard, and we doubt not but you remember that of old, the Kingdom of Scotland did, and does still, belong to the Church of Rome, as all the World knows, and as we have been inform'd, was never held, either of your self, or Predecessors. &c.

The rest of the Brief, which is too long to be inserted at length, contains most of the Objections before-mentioned, against the Pretensions of the Kings of England to the Sovereignty of Scotland. As in all Appearance the Pope had been instructed by the Scotch Ambassadors, it is to be presumed, that, if during the Assembly at Norham, the States of Scotland returned no Answer to what Edward alleged, it was not for want of Proof, but from quite another Motive. The Pope likewise upbraided Edward for all the Violences committed in the Scotch War, and particularly for the Imprisonment of several Bishops. In fine, he made himself Judge of the Controversy between the English and Scots, and ordered the King to send Ambassadors to Rome with all necessary Instructions, within six Months at farthest, after which he would pronounce a final Sentence.

This haughty proceeding was by no means proper to Edward cause Edward to lay down his Arms. He was so offended at it, that, instead of regarding the Pope's Pretensions, he swore, if he heard any more of them, he

They told him, he had still a great deal to do before Matters could be brought to that Pass; and there was not a Scotchman but what would spill the last drop of his Blood in the Defence of his Country. But notwithstanding his Resolution, not to leave Scotland before it was entirely reduced, he durst not refuse the King of France a Truce which he demanded in behalf of the Scots (1).

It was during this Truce that Edward invested his eldest Son, now seventeen years old, with the Principality of Wales, and the Earldom of Chester. The Welsh rejoiced at it, and considered it as a Mark of the King's Favour, because the young Prince was born in their Country.

In the beginning of the next Year, the King summoned a Parliament at Lincoln (2), to consult with them concerning the Pope's Pretensions to Scotland, and what Answer should be returned to his Brief. The Parliament had no less exasperated at the Pope's Pretensions and Haughtiness than the King himself; it was resolved, that a Letter should be sent to the Pope on this occasion, signed by all the Barons of the Realm (3). In this Letter, they plainly tell him the direct contrary to what he asserted in his Brief, namely, that the Crown of England had immemorially enjoyed the Right of Sovereignty over Scotland, and it was publicly known, that Scotland, as to Temporals, never belonged to the Church of Rome. That therefore the Parliament would never suffer the King's Prerogative to be called in question, or Ambassadors to be sent to Rome upon that account, though the King himself should be willing to be so condescending to the Holy See. Finally, they desired the Pope to leave the King and People of England in the Enjoyment of their Rights, without giving them any Disturbance (4). This Letter was followed, some Months after, by another from the King himself, with a Memorial (5), like that drawn up during the Assembly at Norham, to justify that the Kingdom of Scotland had been always dependent on the Crown of England. But whereas, in the first, he carries his Claim higher than Edward the Elder, in this, he derives it from Brutus, first fabulous King of the Isle of Britain, tracing it through all the Reigns of the fictitious Kings mentioned in the History, or rather the Romance of Geoffrey of Monmouth; which he did not venture to do in the Memorial drawn up for the Scots. But every Thing was valid to the Pope and Italians, who were not sufficiently versed in the English History, to discern Truth from Falshood. Besides the King's Letter was very respectful, and contained no Expressions offensive to his Holiness. This Moderation on such an occasion, when he was highly provoked at the Pope's Pretensions, must be ascribed to the Need he had of him, in the Affair concerning the Restitution of Guienne (6).

The Truce with Scotland was no sooner expired, but Edward returned, and spent the whole Winter in that Kingdom. But when he was preparing to renew the War, he was so strongly solicited by the King of France, that he could not refuse the Scots the prolonging of the Truce till November. One might wonder he should have so much Complaisance for Philip, if it was true, as some affirm, that he had made a Peace with France, at Montreuil, and taken possession of Guienne. But it is certain, the Peace between the two Crowns was not fully concluded till 1303, and the Treaty of Montreuil was properly only the Pope's Arbitration, containing several Articles, the Performance whereof might meet with great Difficulties; though in general the two Kings were well enough satisfied with it. This makes Edward's deference for Philip not so strange, since by a Refusal, he might have retarded the Conclusion of a Peace, by which Guienne was to be restored.

The Truce with Scotland being about to expire, Edward sent Segur (7) into that Kingdom to renew the War. This General marched thither, not so much with Delight to fight the Scots, whom he thought unable to resist him, as to destroy the Country. To that end, he divided his Army into three Bodies, which marched at some distance from one another, in order to include the more Ground. His Notion that there was no danger, causing him to march in a careless manner, and without vouchsafing to inform himself of the Posture of his Enemies, he unexpectedly met them near Red Bank (8), five Miles from Edinburgh. As he was too far advanced with the Body he commanded, to receive any Assistance from the others, the Scotch Army commanded by Comyn and Fraser, attacked him without loss of Time, and immediately put him to rout. The nearest of the two other Bodies hearing the General was attacked, hastened to his Relief, but not being able to come time enough, were likewise defeated. Though the Scots were victorious in these two Engagements, it was not without Difficulty and Loss. Their wounded being many, and their Troops much harassed, they were willing to take some rest, when they saw the third Body of the English Army advancing to attack them. This Sight put them into such Disorder, that they would forthwith have taken to flight, if the Exhortations of their Generals had not revived their Courage. This last Battle was the sharpest of the three (9). The English animated with a desire of revenging their Countrymen, and the Scots, encouraged by their two Victories, fought a good while with equal Animosity; but the Scots had the Advantage at last, and routed their Enemies. The English Historians slightly pass over these three Battles, and the Scots, on the contrary, take care to extol this triple Victory (10). It may be, the one say too much, and the others too little. Be that as it will, it cannot be denied that this loss appeared of great Consequence to Edward, since it made him resolve to enter Scotland once more, with a greater Army than ever. It was not in his Power however, to execute his Design till the next Year, because he could not help including the Scots in a Truce made with France till June (11).

Before the Truce was expired, the Peace between the two Crowns was concluded at Paris, on the 20th of May 1303 (12). Philip restored Guienne to Edward, who promised on his Part to do him full Homage, and without Limitation, in the City of Amiens. As for the Allies of the two Kings, there was no mention of them in the Treaty. On the contrary, each Monarch obliged himself by Oath not to assist the other's Enemies. Thus the Scots and the Earl of Flanders were equally abandoned. This is one of the many remarkable Instances, how little petty Princes can rely upon their Alliances with more powerful Sovereigns. Though the first Article always runs, that neither Peace nor Truce shall be made without the Consent of all Parties, it is usually this that is first violated. Indeed, Philip persuaded the Scots, that he would procure them a separate Peace, at a future Interview with Edward; but nothing was farther from his Thoughts. For he had left the Scots to the Mercy of the King of England, only to prevail with him to abandon the Flemings, who having taken up Arms against him, had now gained great Advantages. Balis, from whom this Treaty had taken all hopes of being ever restored, lived upon his Estate in Normandy, and spent the residue of his Days as a private Person (13).

The unexpected Content between Pope Boniface and Philip the Fair, had long delayed the Conclusion of this Peace. The Pope, who had projected to turn the Arms of the Christians against the Infidels, pretended arbitrarily to command all the Princes of Europe, to end their Differences according to his Caprice, and prepare to fend or lead in Person their Forces to the Holy-Land. The Haughtiness wherewith he would have treated the King Edward having nothing more to fear from France, carried his Arms a fourth time into Scotland (2), with so numerous an Army, that he met with no Resistance. He penetrated even to the utmost Bounds of the Island, ravaging the Country on all hands; the Scots being unable to oppose so formidable a Power. Wallace alone kept close to him with some Troops, in order to harraß him, and revenge the Scots upon the English Soldiers, that ventured to stir from the Body of the Army. How great soever Edward's Advantages were, he was not so severe to those who voluntarily submitted, as he was in his former Expedition. He had found, that by driving them to despair, he had himself induced them to revolt. For this reason he treated favorably such as surrendered, and permitted them to redeem their Lands, which he had before refused them. This Gentleness produced so good an Effect, that all the great Men of the Kingdom, seeing no other Remedy, were willing to embrace it (3). Before he quitted the Kingdom, Edward ordered Sterling-Castle to be assaulted, which held out the whole Winter. The vigorous Defence of the besieged, obliged the King to be there in person as soon as the Weather permitted; and yet it was July (4) before he brought them to capitulate (5). Buchanan says, that, contrary to the Articles of the Capitulation, he committed to prison the Governor and Officers of the Garrison.

The taking of Sterling finished Edward's fourth Expedition and third Conquest (6). But though Scotland may justly be said to be conquered on this Occasion, there were still in the Country, out of the reach of the English Arms, certain impenetrable Places, which afforded a Retreat and Sanctuary to those who could not live in Slavery, and who greatly promoted the Restoration of the whole Kingdom to its ancient Liberty. This is what Edward himself in the midst of his Successes could not forbear dreading. The Ridge whereover he treated the brave Wallace, who was basely betrayed into his hands (7), is a clear Evidence, he did not think the Scots subdued, though he was Master of Scotland. To deter them by the Punishment of this great Man, whom he looked upon as the sole Author of their Revolt, he caused him to be tried, condemned, and executed as guilty of High-Treason (8), and ordered his four Quarters to be hung up in four of the principal Towns in the Kingdom (9). This Sentence was pronounced by English Judges, tho' Wallace was a Scotchman, and one that never owned the Jurisdiction of Edward. To excuse, in some measure, so extraordinary a Severity, there are Historians who endeavour to defame Wallace, and charge him with having committed excessive Cruelties. But neither these Accusations, nor the manner of his Death, have been able to hinder Posterity from doing him the Justice he deserved; and unprejudiced People from still deeming him a Hero worthy of a better Fate (10).

Edward having nothing more to do in Scotland, returned into England, where he immediately applied himself to cause his Authority to be respected, for which some among the Barons shewed but little Regard. Segrave (11) was first attacked on this account, to serve for Example to the rest. This Lord being accused of some Misdemeanour, in defence of his Innocency challenged his Accuser to a Duel, according to the Custom of those Days (12). But the King not thinking fit to consent to it, Segrave passed the Sea, in order to fight out of the Kingdom. Though his Disobedience was in some measure softened by his Regard for the King, in forbearing to fight in his Territories, Edward considered it as being of too great Consequence to be left unpunished. As soon as Segrave came back, he was taken into Custody, and brought to his Tryal. The Judges were at a loss to pass Sentence upon this Affair, concerning which there was apparently no Law to direct them. However, after three days Consultation, they declared him worthy of Death, adding in their Sentence, that it should be in the King's Power to pardon him. Edward was extremely offended at the Boldness of the Judges, who seemed to set Bounds to his Prerogative, as if he could not exercise his Clemency without their Permission, and gave them a severe Reprimand. Nevertheless he pardoned Segrave, upon the Intercession of certain Lords, who offered to become Sureties for his good Behaviour (13).

But this was not the only Instance of Severity given by Edward after his Return. He was informed that Justice was administered, throughout the whole Kingdom, with great Negligence and Partiality; that the Magistrates suffered themselves to be bribed with Presents, and the rich were screened from the Rigour of the Laws, whilst the Poor were exposed to the Oppression and Tyranny of the Great. So great a Disorder calling for a speedy and effectual Redress, he gave an extraordinary Commission to Judges nominated by himself, to go into all the Counties and strictly enquire concerning all Malefactors of what Rank soever they might be, and impowered them to execute their Sentences upon the Spot. This Commission was called Trail-Baton (14), a Word whose Derivation is unknown, concerning which there are several Conjectures too long to be inserted. It suffices to say, in order to give a Notion of this extraordinary Court, it was much the same with what is styled in France, Grands Jours. This Severity was a Check to those that thought to screen themselves from Justice by their Credit and Riches, and served at the same time to fill the King's Coffers with the Mulcts and Fines of the Guilty (15).

To these two Instances of Severity he added a third, very proper to shew his Intention that the Laws should be observed, without regard to Birth or Dignity. Prince Edward his Son being persuaded by Piers Gaveston, one of his Favourites, to commit some Outrage against the Bishop of Chester (16), he ordered him to be publicly imprisoned, not suffering his Rank to exempt him from Justice.

This Proceeding would doubtless have been more agreeable to the English, if what he did shortly after, had shewn

(14) That all English who would be sworn a Swiff. As for the Reason why this Commission was so called, it seems to be altogether unknown. Matthew of Westminster gives this Account of it from the English Chronicle. That Chronicle derives it from a certain Instrument antiently belonging to Shoemakers; whereunto they used to beat their Apprentices, called a Trayle-batton. The King in his return out of Scotland was told this Story, concerning those who made it a Trade to take Money to beat other Men. A certain wicked Person, having hired some of those Ruffians to beat another Man, whom he desired to make with himself, they cuffed him very severely; But he happening to know one of them, found out who it was that had hired them; whereupon desiring them to free him, he promised them, if they would give as many Blows to him that let them on Works, he would reward them doubly if which they agreed to: Accordingly, in their return, they met with the Man that first employed them, who striking them, whether they had done as he had desired them? They answered, Yes, and that they were to receive as much more for the like Business; so one of them being a Sussex, crying out Trayle-batton, they all fell upon him, and cuffed him twice as much as they did the other. At which Story the King at first smiled, was related to several Peers by the same Person with Matthew's; and therefore stirred out the English Commission. Byne's Parl. T. II. p. 460. The Commission itself is in Byne's Parl. T. II. p. 960, and dated at Windsor the sixth Day of April.

(15) These Justices were in a manner the same with the Justices in Eyre. Their Office was to make Inquisition through the Realm, by the Verdict of Justices and Jurors, upon Mayors, Sheriffs, Bayliffs, Executors, and others, concerning Extortion, Bribery, and such Grievances, as Intensions into other Men's Lands, Barrenness, and Breach of the Peace, &c. For the Way they went the Writ they used, see Spelman's Glossary.

(16) There was no Bishop of Chester till 1350, when that See was erected by King Henry VIII. The Person here meant, was Walter de Langton, Bishop of Lincoln and Cowsey. (M. Wgh. p. 454.) For Piers, one of the Bishops of this See, removing it to Chelms in 1075, it hence came to pass, that the Successors were many times called Bishops of Chelms. The Outrage committed by the Prince against the Bishop, was, that he, together with Gaveston, and other all Companions, had broke down the Fence of the Bishop's Park, and killed his Deer. Falsian.

1305. the same Moderation and the same Regard for the People. Glement V. Native of Bourdeaux, succeeding Boisac VIII. Edward I thought he should improve his Interest with the new Pope, to obtain a Dispensation from the Oath he had taken, with regard to the two Charters of Liberties. The Pope made no Scruple to grant him that Favour. He supposed, as it appears in his Bull, that the King was forced to take that Oath; and that Supposition, false as it was, seemed to him a sufficient Reason to absolve him from the same. It is pretended Edward purchased this Dispensation by a Present of Gold Plate to the Pope. The Alarm caused by this Step in the Kingdom was not groundless, since it soon began to be perceived, that the King assumed a greater Authority, than was allowed by the Laws and Customs of the Realm. He even affected to discover his Intention, on an Occasion where it could not be mistaken. Glement V. granted him a Tenth upon the Clergy for three Years, reserving one half to himself for the Occasions of the Holy See (1). The Parliament not being able to bear this shameful Trade, which tended to impoverish the Clergy without any Necessity, and to drain the Kingdom of Money, strenuously opposed it, and forbid the Collectors to levy the Tenth. Edward, regardless of the Parliament, removed the Prohibition by his own Authority, permitting the Collectors to go on. This arbitrary Act coming immediately after the above-mentioned Dispensation, made the English apprehensive, the King had formed a Design upon their Liberties, and their Apprehensions appeared but too well-grounded. But if Edward had any such Intent, the Troubles which suddenly broke out a-fresh in Scotland, prevented the Execution, and rendered the Pope's Favour ineffectual.

Robert Bruce and C. myn confer to free their Country.
M. Welf.

People's avout intellectual.

The Scots, though so often vanquished, and as often constrained to swear Fealty to Edward, could not inure themselves to his Yoke. Robert Bruce, Earl of Carrie, was one of those that thought they had most Reason to complain. Not only his Father Robert was excluded from the Crown, but moreover, Edward had now broke his Word with him. He promised to place him on the Throne, in the room of Balliol; but made not the least Step towards the Performance of his Promise. Nevertheless, Robert all along served him faithfully, both before and after his Father's death; flattering himself perhaps, that he would one day accomplish his Promise. But his discourse with Wallace, on the Day of the Battle of Falkirk, and the King's whole Behaviour, convincing him that Edward had only his own ends in view, he entertained the generous Design of exerting his Endeavours, to free his Country from the Servitude to which it was reduced. At the same time, he thought of procuring the Crown of Scotland for himself, to which he pretended to have a lawful Title, notwithstanding the Sentence given against the Earl his Father. John Comyn, fir-named the Red, another Scotch Lord of great Distinction in Scotland, but however, of less Credit than Bruce, was, or seemed to be, in the same sentiments, and to have the Interest of his Country at Heart. This Conformity caused these two Lords to communicate their Thoughts to each other, after long founding one another, without daring to speak their minds. At length, both growing bolder, they had several Conferences together, wherein they agreed upon means to accomplish their Projects. These Conferences ended in an Agreement, containing these two Articles. I. That they should act in common to promote Robert Bruce to the Crown of Scotland. II. That in confideration of Comyn's Services, Bruce should make over to him all his private Patrimony, and appoint him his Lieutenant-General. These Measures being taken, Robert came to Edward's Court, where it was necessary to gain certain Scotch Lords, who were in the Interests of that Prince.

Mean time, whether Comyn repented of what he had done, or, as some affirm, had contrived this Plot on purpose to enslave Robert, he discovered the whole Project to the King. It is said, he even sent him the original Agreement under both their Hands and Seals. The King immediately designed to apprehend Robert, but fearing thereby to mislead his Accomplishes, was contented with narrowly watching him. He hoped to make some fresh Discoveries by means of Comyn, to whom Robert communicated by Letters whatever he did at Court. The King's Design could not be so secret, but it was perceived by the Earl of Gomer (z), an old Friend of the Family of Bruce, then at London. This Earl knowing Robert was narrowly watched, and not daring by word of Mouth to discover so important a Secret, sent him a Pair of Spurs, with some pieces of Gold, as if he had borrowed them of him. Robert, who was endowed with great Penetration, presently found there was some Mystery in this pretended Restitution of his Friend; and concluded, he meant by it to advise him to make his Escape. In this belief, he immediately came to a Resolution, and executed it with such address and diligence, that it was impossible to prevent him, and much more to overtake him. As he had communicated his Thoughts only to Comyn, he did not doubt but he was betrayed by that treacherous Friend. Accordingly, as soon as he came into Scotland, he repaired to Dunfries, where Comyn then was, and meeting him in the Church of the Cordeliers, little expecting his coming, stabbed him with his own Hand (3). This bold Stroke, added to the Plot he had laid, exposing him to the King's Retenement, he saw himself under a necessity of openly declaring himself, well knowing there was no Safety for him but in the Success of his Designs. Whereupon, such Numbers flocked to him, that he was quickly in condition to go well attended to Scots, where he was solemnly crowned (4). After which, all the People in general fided with him.

It was with extreme Vexation that Edward perceived Edward he was mistaken, in imagining he had nothing more to do ^{red at} August do in Scotland. He would not however give over his ^{Scott.}
first Design. But to secure for the future the possession ^{Scott. Feb.}
of that Kingdom, he resolved to reduce it to such a ^{11. p. 28.}
State, that there should be no more danger of a Revolt. ^{Willing.}
Pursuant to this Resolution, he sent Adamar de Valence, ^{Kathol.} Earl of Pembroke (5), with an Army, to prepare the way, whilst he attended all his Forces, at Carlisle (6).
To render his Expedition the more signal, he knighted three hundred young Gentlemen, who attended the Prince, his Son, whom he was willing, on this occasion, to initiate in the Art of War (7).

Mean time, Robert made great Progress in Scotland, Brace in and took several places. He would have carried his Brace in Conquests farther, if the Earl of Pembroke had not stopped Brace in his Career. The Earl entering Scotland, marched directly Brace in to Robert, who, not thinking proper to retreat, on Brace in this first occasion, went himself to meet him. The two Brace in Armies coming to an Engagement, Robert's was put to the Brace in rout (8). But as his Loss was not great, he was willing Brace in to venture a second Battle (9), where he had no better Brace in Success. These two Defeats upon one another, obliging Brace in him to quit the Country, he withdrew to one of the Brace in Hebrides, where he lay concealed at a Relation's House, Brace in in expectation of a more favorable Juncture. Shortly Brace in after, Edward entering the Kingdom with a numerous Brace in Army (10), found the Scots in Conformation, and the Brace in Troops dispersed. So having no Enemies to encounter, Brace in he sent out Detachments on all sides to seize Brace in Adherents. Great Numbers were taken, who all felt Brace in that Prince's Severity (11). Three Brothers of the new Brace in King lost their Heads on a Scaffold. His Queen herself Brace in being sent into England, was kept in close Confinement.

The Pope also returned to himself the said Tenth, & all the Bishops, who were commanded to pay to the Regent of Henry VIII. who first annexed them to the Crown. But says M. Whymmer the Pope was address to this through the Cardinal's, who, at the same time, gave him the Communion, on condition they might enjoy one Year's Profit of all vacant Benefices in their Gift. *M. Whereupon he rose to Danvers, and showing Gowen the letter, accused him of treachery, but the other confidently denying it, Bruce was so exasperated that he stabbed him in the back. I. 8.

gain of forfeiting their Fees. His Intention was to march into the Heart of Scotland, and destroy that Kingdom from Sea to Sea, as he had often threatened. But God permitted him not to execute so barbarous a Purpose. He was hardly arrived at Carlisle, where he had drawn together the finest Army England had ever seen, when he was seized by a Diftemper, which put an end to his Days, and all his Projects. As soon as he found himself ill, he knew he should die; and whilst his Mind was found, he sent for Prince Edward his eldest Son (7), and earnestly recommended to him three things: The first was, vigorously to prosecute the War with Sweland, till he had entirely subdued the Scots. For that purpose, he advised him, to carry along with him his Bones at the Head of the Army, not at all questioning, but that Object would daunt the Courage of the Enemies he had so often vanquished. The second thing he recommended, was to defend his Heart to the Holy-Land, with thirty two thousand Pounds Sterling, he had provided for the Support of the Holy Sepulchre. The third was, never to recall Gervonius. After these his last Orders to his Son, he caused himself to be carried by easy Journeys into Scotland, being desirous to die in a Country he had thrice conquered. In this manner he advanced as far as the little Town of Burgh (8), where his Sickness being increased by a Dyfentery, which came upon him, he resigned his last Breath on the 7th of July, 1307, in the sixty-eighth Year of his Age, having reigned thirty-four Years, seven Months, and twenty Days. His Corps was carried to Waltham, and from thence to Welfingham Abbey, where it was done over with Wax, and laid by Henry his Father (9).

Thus lived and died Edward, the first of that Name since the Norman Conquest, and the fourth since Egbert. This Prince had, doubtless, very noble Qualities, and particularly great Valour and Prudence. He knew how to master his Passions, and return to the right way when he had strayed from it; a Quality never to be sufficient in a Prince, who is to be a Sovereign. When we compare him with his Father, his Grandfather, and his own Son, his Successor, we find he far excelled them all. This Comparison, which one can hardly help making, has been so much to his Advantage, that the English Historians have used the strongest Expressions in his Encomium, and would have him pass for the greatest Prince of his Age. A famous Writer has not scrupled to say, That God had pitched his Tabernacle in the Braetz of that Monarch. But this whole Conduct, with regard to Scotland, does not give him so advantageous an Idea. However, without examining too closely the Expressions used by the Historians in his Praise, it may be said, he was a great King, and that England received considerable Advantages from his Administration. The Kingdom, weakened by the ill Management of the two preceding Kings, was restored to its former Splendor, by the Abilities of this Prince, who knew how to make himself beloved and respected by his Subjects, as well as dreaded by his Neighbours. The Conquest of Wales, in vain attempted by his Predecessors, added a great Lustre to his Reign, and was very beneficial to his Kingdom. That of Scotland would no doubt have gained him more Honour, had it been entirely finished, since the Scottish Historians would have spoken of him in different Terms from what they have done, if at the time of their Writing they had been English.

He was very personable, and taller than the generality of Men by the head. His Hair was black, and curled naturally, and his Eyes of the same Colour, sparkled with uncommon Vivacity. He would have been perfectly well shaped, if his Legs, which were a little too long, had been in proportion to the rest of his Body. Hence he had the Surname of Long-Johns. He joined to his bodily Perfections a solid Judgment, a great Penetration, and a prudent Conduct, which very rarely suffered him to make a false Step. Besides this he had Principles of Justice,

State of England.

The English
prepossessed in favour of Edward II.

THE Reign of Edward I. had been a glorious and triumphant Reign for England. The Principality of Wales was united to the Crown. Scotland, thrice subdued, was upon the Point of being conquered a fourth time, the English Army having now entered the Frontiers. Discord was banished, and a good Harmony was happily established between the Sovereign and the People. All this seemed to make ample amends for the Losses sustained by the Crown beyond Sea, in the Reigns of John and Henry III. not so much by the Weakness of the English as the Pusillanimity of those two Princes: Edward of Caernarvon's Age, who, when he mounted the Throne, was in his twenty third Year, his noble Stature, good Mien, majestic Prefence, joined to the Advantage of being born of a Father so universally esteemed, gave the English fresh Hopes. As never did Prince come to the Crown in more favorable Circumstances, so never was Prince received with a more general Joy and greater Applause. It even seemed, that the extraordinary Satisfaction shown by the People on this occasion, was somewhat injurious to the Glory of the deceased King (1).

This Prince's first Step, a few Days after the Death of his Father, blasted all these agreeable Hopes, and turned the Nation's Joy into Mourning. He had not yet done the last Offices to the great Prince to whom he owed his Birth, when forgetting his Oath concerning Gaveston, he recalled that Favorite. He did not so much as stay for his Return, to make him in an Instant the richest Man in the Kingdom. In the very beginning of his Reign (2) he created him Earl of Cornwall, and gave him the Lands fallen to the Crown by the Death of the late Earl, Son of Richard King of the Romans (3). His Impatience to load with Favours a Man who had been just driven from him, as the Corrupter of his Youth, plainly discovered to what height his Passion was grown, and how much the Consequences were to be feared. But this was not all the Effect it produced. The English began to have a disadvantageous Idea of their new King, and at the same time to think of means to turb the impetuous Heat of a Prince who gave so just occasion of Fear. For, not content with beginning his Reign with the Breach of his late Oath to the King his Father, in recalling a Favorite despised by all the World, he had loaded him with Benefits, and immediately after his Return presented him with the Life of Man. But this was not the only or chief Cause of the Discontent of the English Lords. They could not see, without extreme Grief, such a one as Gaveston dispose at pleasure of all the Offices of the Kingdom, and become absolute Master of the Administration of Affairs, which the King wholly left to his Management. It seemed that Edward desired to be King, only to have it in his Power to shower down his Favours on Gaveston. Wholly intent upon pleasing him, as a Lover his Mistress, he concerned himself with nothing, but to devise every day new Ways to procure him Satisfaction. In short, giving himself up entirely to his Guidance, he let him act as King, whilst himself gloried in being his Subject or Slave. A more excessive Passion was never known. Accordingly People scrupled not to say publicly, the King was bewitched.

If a Woman had been thus enamoured of Gaveston, it would not have been thought very strange, since he wanted no Qualification to recommend him to the Favour of the Fair

Sex. He had a beautiful Face without any defect. His Shape fine and easy, his Air noble and grand, in all the Exercises of the Body he was distinguished for his extraordinary Address. One could not help admiring his Wit, and those sharp and quick Repartees, peculiar to the Gaunts, among whom he was born. To all this some add an uncommon Valour. If he had been less beloved by the King, he would have made a more lasting, though not so considerable, a Fortune: But the Affection of his Prince inspired him with a Pride which proved his Destruction. He would govern the State with an absolute Sway, without sharing his Power with any Person whatever; hardly vouchsafing so much as to use the King's Name. His external Accomplishments, which shone with great Lustre, rendered him so proud and insolent, that he thought himself above all the Great Men; though by his Vices and Debaucheries he degraded himself below the very meanest. The chief Means he used to gain Edward's Affection, was a blind Condescension to his Desires, without examining whether they were virtuous or vicious. When once he came to have an absolute Influence over him, his only Care was to indulge him in his Pleasures, to which that Prince was too much addicted. What then could be expected from the strict Union of two such Persons, but a scandalous Licentiousness at Court, and an entire Decay of the publick Affairs. An unexperienced and mean-spirited Minister, who minded nothing but Trifles, Diversions, Balls, Banquets, and some still less innocent Pleasures, was little capable of governing so large a Kingdom. It was not long before the Nation experienced the fatal Effects of so ill a Choice.

Gaveston's Return was immediately followed by the Disgrace of Langton Bishop of Lichfield (4) and High-Treasurer. Edward hated that Prelate mortally, for having been the principal Promoter of Gaveston's Banishment. As soon as he came to the Crown, he confined him in Wallingford Castle, and would not suffer any Person to speak in his Favour. It was not but upon the pressing Instances or rather Threats of the Pope, that he set him at Liberty again after a long Confinement. To this Violence he added the Removal of all his Father's Officers and Domesticks, without vouchsafing to advise with his Council (5).

The Beginnings of this Reign being very unpromising, the chief Lords thought betimes of means to stop the Impetuosity of their Prince, and curb his capricious Temper. But these Thoughts were interrupted by the Celebration of his Nuptials. The King his Father had contracted him to Jabella of France, Daughter of Philip the Fair, and had strongly charged him, when dying, to consummate the Marriage as soon as possible. This was the only thing wherein he made haste to obey him. Neglecting therefore the War with Scotland, which was so less necessary, he repaired to Boulogne where the King of France stayed for him, to deliver his Daughter into his hands. Never was Wedding more magnificent. There were present four Kings and four Queens, besides a great Number of Princes and Princesses, Lords and Ladies, who made the most numerous Assembly of Nobles that had been seen a great while (6).

Though Edward's Voyage was very short, it failed to produce ill Effects. Upon leaving Boulogne, he was weak as to appoint his Favorite Guardian of the Kingdom, with Power to dispose of all vacant Places and Benefices.

1308. Wardships of young Nobles, and in short, to act in all things with an unlimited Authority (1). So many Favours added to the great Presents he had made him before his Departure into Guienne his Country (2), roused the Jealousy of the Barons. They carried their Resentment so far, that they combined together to hinder the King's Coronation, the Day whereof was now fixed. Edward not being able to break fo powerful a League, where almost all the Lords of the Realm were concerned, chose to prevent the Consequences by fair means. He gave his word to the Barons, that in the next Parliament he would grant whatever they could reasonably desire. This Promise satisfied them. But they were extremely troubled to see Gauvain commissioned to carry the Crown of St. Edward, with which the King was to be crowned; an Honour that, by ancient Custom, belonged to the Princes of the Blood. This Preference provoked the Lords to the last degree against the Favorite, and withal filled them with Indignation against the King, who seemed to glory in his Fondness for a Man odious to the whole Nation. The Coronation however was solemnized (3) without Opposition; the Bishop of Winchester performing this Ceremony, by Order of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was out of the Kingdom. The Form of the Coronation-Oath was as follows:

Bishop of Winchester, Sir, Will you keep and confirm by your Oath to the People of England, the Laws established by the pious Kings your Predecessors, and particularly, the Laws, Customs, Liberties, granted to the Clergy and People by the glorious St. Edward your Predecessor?

King. I will and promise it.

Bishop, Sir, Will you preserve to God, to Holy Church, to the Clergy and People, the Peace of God, fully and to the utmost of your Power?

King. I will.

Bishop, Sir, Will you cause to be observed in all your Judgments, Right and Justice with Discretion, in Mercy, and in Truth, as far as you are able?

King. I will.

Bishop, Sir, Will you promise to keep and cause to be kept the Laws and Statutes that the Community of your Kingdom shall judge fit to enact, and will you defend and protect them to the utmost of your Power?

King. I do promise it.

As this is the first perfect Copy of a Coronation-Oath to be met with in the English History, it will not be foreign to the purpose, to take notice of the Advantage gained by the People upon the Royal Privileges, since the Establishment of Magna Charta. It manifestly appears by this Oath, that, far from supposing the Great Charter to be the Original Title of the Privileges, granted by King John, to the People of England, it was considered only as a Confirmation of the ancient Liberties of the Nation. Upon this Supposition Edward II. was made to swear, he would observe the Laws of St. Edward, which were no other than those of the Anglo-Saxons; left by causing him to swear to keep the Great Charter, there might be room to imagine, the Privileges of the People were founded on the Concessions of the Kings. I do not know whether Edward I. took the same Oath, or it was first introduced at the Coronation of Edward II.

The Solemnity was no sooner over, but Edward forgot his Promise to the Lords. He still continued his Favour to Gauvain, and left him as before, absolute Master of his own and the Kingdom's Affairs. Gauvain for his part, far from endeavouring to allay the impending Storm, affected to govern with an arbitrary Power, without vouchsafing to ask any Man's Advice. He used his Influence over his Master, to divert him from the Thoughts of prosecuting the War with Scotland, which the King his Father had so earnestly enjoyed him, and whereof his Subjects impatiently waited the Issue, in order to be eased of the Burden. Instead of inspiring the King with the Love of Glory and Virtue, he filled the Court with Libertines, Buffoons, and Parasites, and the like pernicious Instruments, proper to corrupt his Inclinations, though they had been naturally as good as they were bad. To this he added the ridiculous Vanity of affecting to wear the King's Jewels, and the Crown itself, which Edward freely permitted. The King's Weakness grew to that height, that he was heard to say, if his Power was equal to his Affection, he would set the Crown on Gauvain's Head. As that was not practicable, he would at least raise him as near the Throne as possible, by giving him his Niece (4), Sister of the Earl of Gloucester, in Marriage.

Every fresh Favour granted to Gauvain by the King, increased the Hatred of the Lords. Hardly would an Englishman, raised to so high a Station, have been endured, much less a private Gauvain Gentleman, in whom they discovered no other Merit, than a handsome Face, an easy Shape, and a quick Wit, very agreeable in Conversation, but little proper to govern a State. They plainly saw, it was in vain to press the King to part with this Favourite, and that he would never consent to their Request, unless he was forced. In this belief, instead of amusing themselves with persuading Edward by Reasons, which would have been ineffectual, they laboured to draw into their League (5), the Members of the Parliament which was to meet, and accordingly did meet in May 1308. By the Management of the Lords, Gauvain's Banishment became the chief, or rather the sole Business of the Session. The two Houses being united in the same Design, demanded of the King, in so strong and positive a manner, that Gauvain should be banished, that he durst not oppose it. He was afraid his Refusal would deprive him of the Aids he expected, for the Continuation of the War with Scotland, and perhaps dreaded something worse. Therefore, without any fruitless Disputes, he ordered Letters Patents (6) to be drawn up, promising to cause Gauvain to depart the Realm before St. John Baptist's Day next ensuing. Mean time, instead of acting so as to give room to believe he designed to perform his Promise, he every Day heaped new Favours on Gauvain. Fifteen Days after his Engagement, he made him a Grant of three thousand Marks a Year in Land (7). This Proceeding clearly shewing, he was by no means resolved to part with his Favourite, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had entered into the Barons League, though he lay under great Obligations to the King, excommunicated Gauvain, in case he did not leave the Realm by the Time prescribed him. Edward little regarding this Censure, only intreated the Pope to annul it. At the same time he wrote to the King of France his Brother-in-law, to desire him to procure an Agreement between him and the Barons, and so to manage, as he might keep his Favourite (8).

These Measures were neither just nor early enough. The Lords finding the appointed time for Gauvain's Departure drew nigh, were so urgent with the King to oblige him to keep his Word, that he durst not but do it. However, in performing his Promise, he found means to give his Favourite a fresh Mark of his Affection, by making him Governor of Ireland, with a very extensive Authority. This Removal, however honorable it was, failed not to give some Satisfaction to the Lords, who hoped to take advantage of his Absence to ruin him. But he himself was not at all pleased. Besides, that this Change of England for Ireland, appeared to him very disadvantageous, he was sensible his Absence from Court could not but prove fatal to him. As he was absolute master of the King, hardly was he arrived in Ireland, when he caused himself to be recalled, under pretence of assisting at a Tournament to be held at Wallingford. The Magnificence wherewith he appeared on this occasion, and the great Number of Foreigners that attended him, and served him for Guards, greatly increased the Jealousy of the Lords, who saw themselves thus braved. To this kind of Insult he added the Indiscretion of passing bitter Jest on the Earls of Lancaster, Warwick, &c.

(1) The King's Patent bears date Decemb. 26. at Windsor. This Act shows the Error of most Historians, particularly Sir Thomas de la Mare, Father Ormer, Speed, the Annotator upon Daniel's History, Dr. Houel, &c. who all say Gauvain was with the King at the Celebration of his Nuptials. Whereas he was then in England, as appears from several Orders in the Rolls, signed by him in the King's Absence, with the Subscription T. Gauvain. His Orders of such Mistakes are rectified in Rapin by means of the Rolls.

(2) Walter Haug, Earl says, The King bestowed upon him all the Money hoarded up by the late King, which amounted to a hundred thousand Pounds. Besides this, Gauvain had the Confidence, through the King's Indulgence, to take the Treasure and Jewels of the Crown, and send them beyond Sea to his own Use. Upon this Marriage the King bestowed upon him the Honours of Ticel, and Berkensfeld, the Castles and Manors of Shrop, in Yorkshire; Hamp, Devon, Gloucester, Cambridge, Trerik and Upton, Northamptonshire; Canterbury, in the Isle of Wight, with several other Lands. He also granted him Lands in Guienne, to the Value of three thousand Marks a Year. Tyrrel. Rymer's Fed Tom. III. p. 49. 57.

(5) They met at Ware, and from thence went to Northampton, and issued out Summons to the rest of the Barons to come thither to a Treaty at Canterbury, concerning the great Affairs of the Kingdom. He called the Earl of Lancaster, Stage-player; the Earl of Pembroke, [Joseph] the Jaw; the Earl of Warwick, the wild Boar of Ardenne; and in like manner, gave every one of his private Enemies Nicknames, to make them ridiculous, or discover their Faults (1). The Lords seeing themselves insulted by the Favorite, and deceived by the King, met together to concert means to oblige Edward to keep his Word.

Quickly after, they presented a Petition to him (2), setting forth, that the State and his own Household were so ill managed, that it was absolutely necessary to find means to prevent the Consequences of this Disorder. They added, the only proper Method, as they thought, was, for the King to leave to certain Lords appointed by the Parliament, the Care of making a Regulation for the well-governing the Kingdom and his own domestick Affairs (3). Edward had already shewn great Signs of Weakness, in his regard for their former Demands. He had thereby made them sensible, that if, for the future, they shewed any Resolution, he would not have the Courage to resist them. They were not mistaken in their Conjectures. This Prince, as timorous on certain occasions, as he was proud and haughty on others, was incapable of discerning when he should give way, and when stand his ground. Accordingly, he took precisely the contrary to what he should have done. Instead of complying with the Barons, when they first petitioned for Gauvain's Removal, he obstinately persisted in retaining him against all the Rules of Policy. Afterwards, far from opposing to the utmost of his Power, the Motion of placing the Government in other hands than his own, and instead of running all Hazards, rather than give his Consent, he believed it expedient to yield to their Importunity. Without considering the consequence of a Condescension so pernicious to his Authority and Quiet, he permitted the Parliament to chuse seven Bishops, eight Earls, and six Barons (4), to make the proposed Regulation.

In Consequence of the King's Consent, the Lords having finished the Regulation, presented the Plan to the King, who approved it, and gave them Power to cause it to be observed for one Year. It contained but six Articles, whereof the two principal were: That the King should not dispose of any part of his Revenues; which should for the future be expended in paying his Debts, and maintaining his Household, that he might live on his own Income, without taking any thing from others: That the Great Charter should be punctually kept; and in case any Article should be obscure or doubtful, it should belong to the Lords elected (who were styled Ordainers) to explain it. There was nothing inserted concerning Gauvain's Banishment.

Probably, the Barons were of Opinion, there was no danger from that Favorite, so long as the Government was in their Hands. Nevertheless, when they afterwards saw the King continue to heap Favours on him, and, without asking their Advice, had made him Governor of Nottingham, and Warden of the Forests on this Side the Trent, they drew up one and forty new Articles, to which the King was forced to assent. By one of these Articles, Gauvain was expressly sentenced to perpetual Banishment.

Edward having thus suffered himself to be bound with Fetters which he could not shake off, resolved, tho' with extreme Regret, to part with Gauvain. However, to save him the shame of being banished, he gave him an imaginary Commission to levy Troops in Guienne, for the Assistance of the Earl of Flanders, who had been at variance with the Court of France, but the Dispute was now at an end.

Letter
Brady's Ap-

No. 54.

Gauvain's Banishment was of no long continuance, Edward, who could not live without him, disregarding the Articles he had lately signed, recalled him without acquainting the Ordainers. Shortly after he sent circular Letters to the Sheriffs, to give them notice thereof, and to justify what he had done. He told them, that being bound by his Coronation Oath, to see the Laws of the Realm put in execution, there was no Authority that could absolve him therefrom: That Gauvain being banished by a notorious Violence, and without a legal Sentence, he could not deprive him of the Benefit of the Law, to which all his Subjects were intitled: That therefore, he had caused him to return into the Kingdom, not with design to screen him from Justice, but that he might be tried according to the usual Form: That in the mean time, he considered him as a good and faithful Subject, and ordered them to publish this Declaration in their respective Justifications.

The Lords were not much displeased that the King by this Proceeding, had furnished them with a pretence to complete the ruin of a Favorite who could not be born from him without violence. In order to open a Way to their End, they endeavoured to gain the People by exclaiming against the King's Conduct. They said publicly, there was no depending upon what was enacted by the Parliament, since the King disregarded it. That it was easy to see, the King was aiming at an arbitrary Power, and the whole Nation was equally concerned to oppose the Growth of a despotic Power, which tended to render the Subjects too many Slaves. These Discourses, being supported by their Emulraries among the People, began to create an universal Discontent, of which the King had but too much Reason to dread the Consequences. He imagined, he should be able to prevent them by publishing a Proclamation, protesting it was his Intention to observe the one and forty Articles. But as he had violated one of the principal in recalling his Favorite, his Protestation produced no Effect.

Mean-while, Gauvain, still more indiscreet than his Master, instead of appealing his Enemies by his modest Behaviour, daily grew more proud and arrogant. He acted as if he had nothing to fear, or was ignorant of the Barons Designs. He had even the boldness to speak insolently to the Queen; who not being able to obtain any satisfaction, complained bitterly to the King her Father. She told him that Gauvain was the sole Cause of her Misfortunes, and the King her Husband's Fondness for that unworthy Favorite, alienated his Affections from her, and made him an entire Stranger to her Bed. This Complaint has made some suspect, that the Familiarity between the King and Gauvain was of a very criminal Nature. But it may be their Suspicions are carried too far.

Mean while the Barons kept their first Design always in view. There were among them Persons of great Abilities, who knew how dangerous it is, on these Occasions, to act by halves; and that if such sort of Enterprizes are not brought to an Issue, they seldom failed to ruin the Authors. The Earl of Lincoln (5) was one of the most considerable of the Party, as well for his Birth and high Offices, as for his Age and Experience. As he was confined to his Bed by a Fit of Sickness, he was apprehensive, that after his Death the Confederates would give way, and was willing to endeavour to prevent that Accident, which would have occasioned their Ruin. To that end, having sent for his Son-in-law the Earl of Lancaster, Grandson of Henry III., he conjured him in the strongest and most moving Terms, not to abandon the Church and People of England to the Mercy of the Pope and Kings. He told him, his Birth obliged him to endeavour to free the Kingdom from the Oppressions it unfortunately laboured under. He charged him to have always a great regard for the King. But withal, he added, that his Regard ought not to hinder him from doing all that lay in his Power, to remove from the King's Person the Foreign Ministers and Favorites. That Honour, Conscience, the Publick Good, called upon him to procure the Observance of the Great Charter, the only Basis of the Welfare and Peace of the Kingdom. In conclusion, he advised him to join heartily with the Earl of Warwick (1), who among all the Confederate Lords was best able to carry on the important Undertaking. It was not long before the Effects of this Advice were seen. The Earl of Lancaster entering into a strict Confederacy with the Earls of Warwick, Pembroke, Arundel, Hereford, Warren, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several other Bishops and Barons, they unanimously resolved to take Arms, under the usual Pretence of defending the Rights of the Church and State.

The Earl of Lancaster was chosen General of the intitled Army, an Honour which could not be refused to his Merit, though no Regard had been had to his Qualities.

(1) This Year a Parliament was held at Wolmister, in the beginning of Leit, and afterwards adjourned till a Month after Easter; wherein the King caused the Great Charter, and that of Forreys, to be confirmed; in witness whereof, the Lords and Clergy gave him the twenty five last Partes of all their personal Estates. ty (1). Immediately after this Resolution was taken, all the Confederate Barons dispersing themselves into the several Counties, publicly levied Troops. They used such Expedition, that in a short time their Forces were assembled at the appointed Rendezvous. It was impossible for Edward to be ignorant of these Preparations. And yet, as if he was unconcerned, he took no Notice of them. Instead of thinking of Means to satisfy the incensed Barons, or defend himself against their Insults, he minded nothing but his Diversions at York, where he was then with Gaveston. His only care was to heap new Favours on his Minion, remaining in a surprising Indolence, whilst he saw the whole Kingdom ready to rise against him. He seemed to affect continually to act contrary to his real Interests, and to neglect to take such Measures, as a Person of an ordinary Understanding might have pointed out to him. At the very time that he saw the Barons in Arms, to compel him to observe the one and forty Articles, he wilfully violated one of the principal, in making the Bishop of Lichfield High-Treasurer without the Consent of the Ordainers. (2) But this was not the only Error he committed on this Occasion. As if he had been in a condition to give Laws to the Barons, he would have reformed at the same time, the Regulation, on pretence he had referred to himself the Power of correcting with the Advice of the Ordainers, some Articles prejudicial to his Prerogative. It was easy to see this was no proper Season for that Work. And yet he nominated on his part Commissioners to set about the Alterations.

The Barons had then other Designs. After drawing all their Forces together, they marched directly for York, thinking to surprize the King, whose Supineness gave them room to hope every thing. But upon the first notice of their Approach, he retired to Newcastle, where they followed him without loss of time. That Town not seeming to him strong enough, he left it and shut himself up in Scarborough Castle, which he deemed his best Fortres in the North. He began then to see his Error in deferring so long to prepare for his Defence: But it was too late to think of it. However, in spite of the improbability of succeeding, he resolved to go into Warwickshire; where he expected to raise an Army, upon the vain hopes, that the People would flock in Crowds to lift under his Banner. But as he was under greater Concern for Gaveston than himself, he left him behind at Scarborough, recommending him to the care of the Governor as a precious Trust, and a sure Pledge of the Confidence he placed in him.

Whilst Edward was taking his too late Measures, the Barons, who entered Newcastle the very day he departed, seized whatever was left there by the King and his Favorites, their haste not permitting them to carry away any thing. In Gaveston's Baggage were found many Jewels, belonging to the Crown, and of which an exact Inventory was taken, that an account might be given of them hereafter. And as soon as the Earl of Lancaster was informed of the King's departure from Scarborough, and his leaving Gaveston there, he sent the Earls of Pembroke and Warren to besiege that Castle. At the same time, he marched himself with the rest of the Army towards the Center of the Kingdom, in order to have it more in his Power to oppose the Designs of the King. The two detached Earls advancing towards Scarborough without any opposition, formed the Siege, and carried it on with great Vigour. (3) Though the Place was one of the strongest in the Kingdom, it was so ill-provided with necessaries for its Defence, that in a few Days Gaveston was under a necessity to deliver himself into the Hands of his Enemies. (4) He obtained however, a sort of Capitulation, whereby it was promised him that he should speak with the King, and be tried by his Peers according to the usual Form.

As soon as Edward heard of his Favourite's being thus taken, he earnestly solicited his Liberty, or that at least, he might see and speak with him according to promise. Above all, he conjured the confederate Lords to spare the Prisoner's Life, assuring them, on that Condition, he would give them entire Satisfaction concerning their Grievances. Most of the Barons were again carrying Gaveston to the King, well knowing that his Request tended only to get him out of their Hands. But they consented at last, upon the Earl of Pembroke's representing, that having given his Word in the Name of all the Confederates, they were obliged to perform it: That if they would trust him with conducting him, he would undertake to convey him to the Kings, and to restore him to them at a day and place appointed.

Pembroke designed to conduct his Prisoner to Wallingford Castle, where the King was to come and speak with him. Accordingly, taking the Road to Oxfordshire, he came to Deddington (5), where he left Gaveston under a Guard, whilst he himself went and lodged in a neighbouring Castle (6). He did not think it necessary to use greater Precaution in a Place where the King had no Troops, and where consequently there was no danger from him: But he found he had taken his Measures very ill. The Earl of Warwick, who was violently against this Interview of the King and Gaveston, hearing how they quartered, came that night to the House where Gaveston was, carried him away by force, and conducted him to and detained him at Warwick. On the morrow, the same Earl with some others the most violent of the Party, after a quick Trial, ordered his Head to be cut off (7). A mad Action, if ever there was any, which in violating a Capitulation, trampled upon the Laws of the Land, and the Respect due at all times from Subjects to their Sovereign. What would these same Lords have said, if the King or Gaveston had done the like?

Though Edward was extremely incensed at the Boldness of these Lords, it was not in his Power to be revenged, and the Barons took no care to give him any Satisfaction for this Outrage. On the contrary, not content with being thus rid of the Object of their Hatred, they demanded more haughtily than ever, the Performance of the forty Articles, and a speedy Redress of the Grievances of the State: At the same time, they marched to London, where the King was retired, bent upon obtaining by force, what they plainly saw he would never voluntarily grant them. Mean while, the King not daring to trust the Londoners, was gone to Canterbury, where he was not much safer. In this Extremity, he had recourse to the Mediation of the Pope's Nuncio, and of Lewis Earl of Evreux the Queen's Uncle, then in England, and of the Earl of Gloucester (8) his nephew, who had stood neuter. By means of these three Mediators, who laboured heartily in the Affair, certain Articles were agreed upon (9), with which every one seemed satisfied. The Lords promised to restore whatever was taken at Newcastle; publicly to ask the King's Pardon; and declare that without any design against his Person, their sole Aim had been to redress what was amiss in the Government. The King promised on his part, to grant a general Pardon to them and all their Adherents, reserving a Power to grant the like to those that favoured Gaveston's Return.

The Barons punctually performed their Word in restoring whatever was seized at Newcastle: But Edward was not so sincere. He delayed publishing the General Pardon above a Year, and during that Space used all what Safe-Conducts soever he offered him, it was not possible to persuade the Earl to put himself in his Power, before the Pardon was proclaimed. At length, the Barons weary of all the Evasions used by the King, began to take Arms again, when the King of France sent the Earl of Evreux his Brother, accompanied with Enguerrand de Marigny, to try to adjust these Differences. The Queen likewise did all that lay in her Power. It was very difficult to accomplish it, because the King still deferring to publish the promised Pardon, the Barons believed they had still reason to fear he never designed it. During the Negotiation, the King went and conferred with his Father-in-law, and left Orders that the Parliament should meet whilst he was absent (10). The Earl of Lancaster and the Barons of his Party, made no Scruple to be present, being encouraged by the King's absence. But hearing he was returned and landed at Sand-1313. which, they immediately withdrew, not caring to trust to the Safe-Conducts sent them from the Place of his Landing.

Their Retreat obliged the Parliament to break up. Affairs being in such a Posture as a fresh Rupture was every Moment to be feared, the Mediators were so urgent with the King to give the Barons Satisfaction, that he could no longer defer it. He ordered therefore the two general Pardons to be drawn up, which were confirmed shortly after by the Parliament. But as a general Pardon did not fully satisfy the Parties concerned, it was necessary likewise to give a particular Pardon to four hundred and sixty eight Persons, whose Names are mentioned in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Whilest this Negotiation was in hand, the Queen brought into the World, in the beginning of October (1) 1313, a Prince, christened Edward.

The publishing of the general Pardons, as well for the confederate Barons as for Gaveston's Friends, having at length restored Peace in the Kingdom, the Parliament (2) granted the King a considerable Subsidy towards a vigorous Prosecution of the War with Scotland. Before the Parliament broke up, the Barons publicly begged the King's Pardon in Westminster-Hall, before all the People. This was done in a very solemn manner. The Barons speaking to the King, made use of the most humble and submissive Terms, as if the Pardon he had granted them were the pure Effect of his Clemency. After this, they returned to their homes, satisfied in Appearance, but however without ceasing to distrust the King. They had too highly offended him, to hope he would ever forget it. The Death of the Earl of Warwick, which happened soon after, increased their Mistrust, every one believing he was poisoned.

Whilest England endured violent Shocks by the Weakness and little Genius of the Governour, Scotland daily grew stronger, by the prudent Conduct of a courageous and vigilant King, who wisely improved the Repose procured to them by the Death of Edward I. Robert Bruce, who may justly be called the Restorer of the Scotch Monarchy, politically suppressed the Factions which divided his Subjects, and united them all in the design of shaking off the Yoke of Servitude. By this happy Union, he was in a condition not only to recover the best Part of his Country, but also to carry his Arms into England. I am now going to relate the particulars of the Scotch War, which I could not, without confusion, intermix with the Relation of the domestick Troubles in England.

Edward I, resolved utterly to destroy Scotland, and probably would have reduced the Kingdom to a wretched Condition, if Death had not snatched him out of the World very opportunely for the Scots. Robert Bruce was preparing to take advantage of the Confinement of the English, occasioned by the loss of Edward: But a great Fit of Sickness seizing him at the same time, hindered his entering upon Action. Mean while, the Scots, who knew not yet the Character of Edward II, were in great Perplexity, their King being very dangerously ill, and their Forces much inferior to those of their Enemies.

Edward II's sudden Resolution to return into England, after advancing as far as Dumfries, and striking Terror into the whole Kingdom, gave them room to entertain better hopes. His Impatience to meet Gaveston, to marry the Princess designed for him, and to be crowned, expelled all thoughts of War, to which he had no Inclination. So, leaving his Army under the Conduct of John Comyn a Scotch Lord, he returned into England (3).

His abrupt departure caused great murmurs in the Army and Kingdom. People could not behold him without Astonishment, relinquishing the Conquest of Scotland, at a time when the Number and Ardor of his Troops, and King Robert's Illness, seemed to warrant him a glorious Campaign. His chusing Comyn to command the Army was no less disliked. This General was a Scot, and though of the opposite Party to Robert, and his particular Enemy, his being a Foreigner was alone sufficient to offend the English, who thought themselves dishonoured by this Preference. What happened quickly after, shewed their Complaints were not groundless. Comyn willing to take Advantage of Robert's Illness, whom he thought incapable of heading his Troops, advanced in order to attack the Scots. Though Robert still found himself extremely weak, he believed he ought not to decline fighting. At such a Juncture, a Retreat might have dishonoured his Subjects, and occasioned the Loss of his whole Kingdom. In this Resolution, having mounted his Horse, supported by two Equires, he drew up his Army, and expected the Enemy, with a Steadiness that produced a wonderful Effect. The English imagined, this little Army would never dare to stand before them. But when by the good Posture of the Scots, they found themselves disappointed, their Courage began to cool, that hardly could they be brought to begin the fight. So weak an Attack, and so ill seconded, inspiring the Scots with fresh Courage, they fell with great Fury upon their Enemies, and put them entirely to the rout. This Defeat was the more dishonorable to the English, as, besides their being superior in Number, they were the same Troops that had so frequently vanquished the Scots, and now suffered themselves to be beaten by an Army levied in haste, and consisting of undisciplined Soldiers. Comyn retiring into England after his Defeat, Robert entered the County of Argyle, which still belonged to the English, and ravaged it all over. Shortly after, Edward Bruce his Brother, gave the English another defeat in the County of Galloway. These two Victories gave the Scots such a Superiority, that they began from thenceforward to despise the English, and forget their past Losses.

How little Inclination however Edward had for War, he could not avoid endeavouring to stop the Progress of the King of Scotland. In 1309, that is, in the second Year of his Reign, he led in Person a powerful Army into that Kingdom. But as he had taken no care for Provisions, depending upon what he expected to find in the Enemy's Country, he was obliged to march back his Army into England for want of Subsistence. Robert, and others more provident than he, had carried away, or destroyed before-hand, whatever might serve to maintain the Enemies Troops. Edward's Retreat gave the King of Scotland, an opportunity to become master of several Places in possession of the English, and to make that Year a very prosperous Campaign. The Troubles which afterwards happened in England on account of Gaveston, enabled that Prince to make a still greater Progress. In 1310 and 1311, he entered England twice, and carried away a great Booty. In 1312 he recovered Perth, Lanerick, Dumfries, Roxburgh; and lastly, Edinburgh Castle, which was taken by Storm by the Earl of Murray his General. This Year the little Isle of Man voluntarily submitted to him.

Whilest Robert continued his Conquests, Edward, wholly employed in seeking means to be revenged on the Barons, for putting Gaveston to Death, was surprisingly negligent with regard to Scotland. Instead of hastening an Agreement with the Lords, in order to unite all his Forces, he prolonged the Negotiation, by a Policy very pernicious to the Affairs of the State. Mean time, Robert took advantage of the Negligence of the English. After making himself master of all the Places Edward I. possessed in Scotland, except Sterling, he sent, in 1313, his Brother Edward to besiege that Town, the strongest then in Scotland. The Siege was carried on very vigorously: but the Besieged made as brave a Defence. However, [Philip] Mowbray, the Governor of the Place, finding his Master made no Preparations to relieve him, thought to do him good Service in signing a Capitulation, whereby he promised to surrender the Town in a Year, if he were not relieved by that time.

Edward having sufficient time to prepare, and desiring at any rate to prevent the Loss of so important a Place, summoned all his Vassals to meet him with their Troops (4). The English, Gaveston, and Welsh (5), were so ready to obey him, that by June 1314, he saw himself at the Head of a hundred thousand Men. The Soldiers already devoted in their Imagination, whatever the former Ravages of Edward I. had left in Scotland. Only the Earls of Lancaster, Arundel, Hereford, and the new Earl of Warwick, refused, on this occasion, to serve the King, their mistrust of him not permitting them to put themselves in his Power.

This numerous Army entering Scotland, advanced the End of within view of Sterling. Robert expected them at the head of thirty thousand Men, inveterate in the Fatigues of War, and who had frequently worsted the English. He drew up his Army on an advantageous Ground, where 1314. he could not be furrounded. A Mountain full of inaccessible Rocks, covered one of his Flanks, and the other was secured by a deep Morass. How great soever the Unequality of the two Armies might be, the Scots being determined to conquer or die, received their Enemies with that Vigor and Resolution, that they soon put this numerous Army into Disorder and Confusion. The English Horse being pressed at first with a Fury they could not withstand, were the Occasion, by their Flight, of the Defeat of the whole Army; a Defeat the most terrible England had ever endured since the beginning of the Monarchy (1). The Scotch Writers mount the Enemies Loss to fifty thousand Men. They pretend, the Number of the Prisoners taken on this occasion exceeded that of the Conquerors. The Earl of Gloucester, Nephew of Edward II, with many other Lords of Distinction (2), and above seven hundred Knights, lay dead on the Field of Battle. The English reduce the Number of the Slain to ten thousand. But the Consequences of this Action discover that their Loss was much greater, since from that time they ventured no more to take the Field.

Edward, with the Remains of his Army, hastily retreated, without thinking himself out of Danger till he was at York, where the dispersed Fugitives came to him (3). He formed a very considerable Body, with which he shewed a Desire to re-enter the Enemies Country, and hazard another Battle. But the Constitution of his Troops was so great, that he could not prevail with them to endeavour to retrieve their Honour. This Battle, called the Battle of Bannockburn, procured the Scots, besides an insatiable Booty, a Peace which lasted several Years. They acquired to great a Superiority over the English, that these last, far from being able to recover what they had lost in Scotland, were long forced to see their Borders ravaged, without daring to make the least Resistance. Their Terror was so great, that one of their Historians affirms, three Scotch Soldiers were sufficient to put a hundred Englishmen to flight, so much were they discouraged by this terrible Defeat.

Whilst Fortune shone on all occasions to humble Edward, an Impostor, one John Deydras, a Tanner's Son of Exeter, sought to take his Crown from him, by maintaining that he was himself Edward, and changed at Nurfe. So extraordinary and ill-formed a Project served only to bring the Impostor to the Gallows, instead of a Throne, which he would have mounted. Without doubt he built his hopes upon the little Esteem the English had for their King, having probably imagined it would not be difficult, to make them believe he was not Son of Edward I, who had none but noble and generous Inclinations. But it was not this vile Instrument, which Providence was pleased to use, to ruin this unhappy Prince, though in some measure this Event may be considered as a sort of Preface of what was to happen.

The Loss sustained by the English in Scotland was followed by a dreadful Famine which lasted three Years, and destroyed an infinite Number of People. In vain did the Parliament endeavour to help it by settling the Price of Provisions: They were forced the next Year to revoke the Act that had been passed on that Account. (4) But neither War nor Famine, nor the Murmurs of the People, were able to hinder the King from expending a large Sum, in celebrating the Funeral of his Favourite, whose Body was removed to King's Langley in Hertfordshire. He would honour the Funeral Pomp with his Presence, attended by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other Bishops. But the Barons positively refused to assist at the Obsequies of a Man so odious to them, and whom they deem'd unworthy of the Honour done to his Memory.

Mean time the Famine raged in so terrible a Manner that one can hardly give Credit to what Historians say of it. (5) They are not content with telling us, that the most loathed Animals were used for Food, but what is much more horrible, People were forced to hide their Children with all imaginable Care, to prevent their being stolen and eaten by Thieves. They assure us, that Men themselves took precautions to hinder their being murdered in private Places, knowing there were but too many Instances that some had been served in that manner, to feed such as could find no other Subsistence. We are told likewise, that the Prisoners in the Goals devoured one another in a barbarous manner, the extreme Scarcity of Provisions not permitting their being allowed necessary Food. The Bloody-Flux, caused by gross feeding, completed the Misery of the English. Such Numbers died every day, that hardly could the Living suffice to bury the Dead. The only Remedy that could be found against the Famine, but which was not capable of bringing all the necessary Relief, was, to prohibit on pain of death, the brewing any sort of Beer, to the end, the Corn usually expended that way, might serve to make Bread (6).

Notwithstanding these Calamities, which should have turned their Thoughts to Religion and Repentance, the mutual Enmity which the King and Barons had long harboured in their Breasts, was seen daily to increase. It was almost impossible but this violent Hatred should in the end produce very fatal Effects. Edward, not being able to forget the Injuries he had received, entertained in his heart a strong desire of Revenge, which put him upon seeking all possible means to gratify it. He was chiefly exasperated against the Earl of Launceston, whom he looked upon as the sole Author of his Disgraces, and his most dangerous Enemy. Had the Earl's Life been in his Power, he would not, probably, have spared it. But as his Dissimulation had not been capable of drawing him into any Snare; finding he could not reach his Person, he attempted to deprive him of his Estate and Honour. To that purpose, he created him a Trouble, which the most immoderate Mistrust could not have prevented.

Whilst the Earl kept at a distance from Court (7), a certain Knight, called Sir Richard St. Martin, a Man of a mean Look, and dwarfish Stature, presented to the Judges a Petition, claiming the Wife of the Earl of Launceston, Heiress of the Families of Lincoln and Salisbury. He set forth in his Petition, that he had carnally known her, and that she had made him a Promise of Marriage, before she was contracted to the Earl. The Countess, dissatisfied with her Husband, having, to her eternal Shame, confessed the Fact, was adjudged, with all her Estate, to the unworthy Claimant. This Affair, which would have required a long Examination, was so quickly decided, that it was easy to see the Judges were gained before-hand, and the King himself had been a Promoter of the Process. An Injury of this Nature done to a Prince of the Royal Blood, exceedingly beloved by the People, raised an extreme Indignation against the King. Nothing was every where heard but Murmurs against his Government. As he had then no Favorite to bear the Blame, it was all cast on himself, and People said publicly, never was the Throne of England filled by a Prince so unworthy to rule a free Nation. There were even some who took the Liberty to upbraid him to his Face for his ill Conduct. Upon a certain Holiday (8), Edward dining in publick in Westminster-Hall, a Woman in a Mask came on horseback

But he was very much surprized to hear only-outrageous Reproaches for his Cowardice, Tyranny, and all the Grievances introduced in his Reign. The Woman being apprehended, confessed, she was bribed by a certain Knight to play that part; and the Knight boldly maintained, That believing the King would read the Letter in private, he thought it the properest way to let him know the complaints of his Subjects.

1318. Whilft England was reduced to extreme Defolation, Edward, without troubling himself about the Ravages, the Scots continued to make on the Borders, minded only how to humble the Barons, who began to form new Projects, the Consequences whereof he had reason to fear. They had lately presented to him a Petition, containing a long List of the People's Grievances, of which they demanded a speedy Redress. Nothing was farther from his Thoughts than to reform abuses. However as he durst not openly discover his intentions, he had referred the matter to the Parliament which was to meet at Lincoln. A Scottish Invasion at the same time, afforded him an excuse to prosecute the Parliament several times, and at length to dissolve it. This Proceeding so incensed the Barons, that with one consent they resolved to take Arms, to obtain by Force the Satisfaction they required. They would have doubtless extremely distressed this weak Prince, incapable of governing himself at so nice a Juncture, if some Lords of more Moderation had not joined with the Pope's Legate to promote a reconciliation. These Mediators obtained of the King, that for the Satisfaction of the confederate Barons he should admit a certain number of them into his Council, and promise to do nothing without their advice. The Earl of Lancaster was to be one: but as he could not trust the King, it was agreed he should nominate a Baron or Knight to supply his place (1). Moreover Edward promised to grant an absolute pardon, without any restrictions, to the Earl of Lancaster, for all that was passed. This Agreement was made and signed at Leck on the 9th of August 1318, and confirmed three days after by (2) the Parliament, called upon the pressing Instances of the Mediators. After this Affair was ended, the King and Earl of Lancaster meeting on a Plain near Leicester, embraced and kissed one another in token of a perfect Reconciliation. Let us now return to the War with Scotland, which still continued during the Troubles in England.

After Robert's obtaining near Sterling that signal Victory which proved to fatal to the English, he pushed the Vanquished into England, where he committed prodigious Ravages, whilft Edward durst not stir from York to oppose his Enemy. The King of Scotland, not satisfied with this Advantage, projected the Conquest of Ireland upon the Crown of England. This Island had long been governed by English Officers, who were more careful to enrich themselves, than to promote the Publick Good. Their arbitrary Proceedings had bred among the Irish so great and universal Discontent, that they wanted only a favorable Opportunity to revolt. The Defeat of the English Army before Sterling giving them reason to believe the present Juncture was very proper to execute their Design, they sent word to the King of Scotland, that they were ready to cast off the English Yoke, provided he would give them Assistance. Robert took care not to lose so fair an Opportunity to become Master of the Island, or at least to make there a powerful Diversion. He sent thither some Troops under the Command of his Brother Edward, who heading the Rebels, conquered the best Part of the Island, and was even acknowledged for King. Whilft he was carrying on his Conquests, Robert amused the King of England with Proposals of Peace, which he seemed to do with Sincerity and Earnestness, but artfully raised from time to time Difficulties, which hindered Matters from being concluded. This Proceeding lasted till 1327, without Edward's perceiving his Enemy's Artifices. His little Penetration however even made him entirely lose Ireland, had he not been roused by the Murmurs of the People. The Prejudice England might receive by the Loss of that Island was so manifest, and the Consequences so plainly laid before him, that at length he relolved to send thither a powerful Supply, under the Conduct of Mortimer.

With this Aid the English that were in Ireland, finding themselves able to take the Field, marched to attack the Scotch Prince. Mean while, the King of Scotland, receiving Intelligence how much his Brother stood in need of being speedily relieved, went himself into Ireland. But upon his Arrival, he heard his Brother was defeated and slain in a Battle wherein he had rashly engaged (3). Robert's Loss on that occasion breaking all his Measures, and disabling him from continuing the War in that Country, he thought it more proper to go and improve the Advantages, lately gained by his Arms in Scotland. In his Absence Douglas, one of his Generals, defeated the Army sent by the King of England into that Kingdom, to try to take Advantage of Robert's being in Ireland.

This fresh Victory, which put it out of the Power of the English to withstand the Scots, inspired Robert with the Thoughts of improving it, by laying Siege to Berwick, which was still in the hands of the English (4). He could not make his Preparations without Edward's Knowledge. But his knowing it was to little purpose, since he had neither Money nor Troops sufficient to prevent his Enemy's Designs. His Subjects were so averse to him, that he could not expect to procure, either a timely or powerful Aid. And supposing he could have expected it, he plainly saw the Parliament would make him pay dear for the Subsidy they should grant (5). In this Extremity he turned to the Pope, and earnestly intreated him to interpose his Authority, in order to procure him a Peace, or at least a Truce with Scotland. John XXII, who had lately succeeded Clement V, immediately granted Edward's Request. He looked upon this as a very favorable Opportunity, to extend his Power over crowned Heads. Accordingly he took upon him to make Peace between Edward and Robert, not as Mediator, but as Sovereign Arbitrer, and by Virtue of his Apostolical Authority. To that end, he sent two Legates into England, with a Power, which showed that he thought himself invested with Sovereign Authority over all Kings, even in temporal Affairs. Their Commission ran, that they were to make Peace between the two contending Nations, in what manner they pleased, and to compel both Princes to accept it, on pain of Excommunication, and an Interdict upon their Dominions. But as he judged such a Peace could not be made without some Debate, which would take up time, he ordered his Legates to cause a two Years Truce to be published in his Name, and by his Authority; and gave them Power to excommunicate those that refused to observe it. The Legates, furnished with so large and extraordinary Power, came into England, and immediately caused the Truce to be proclaimed. Edward paid an implicit Obedience to it, not considering he thereby sacrificed to the Court of Rome the most authentic Privileges of the Crown. It was not the same with Robert. Under pretence, that the Pope and his Legates gave him not the Title of King, he would never permit the last to enter Scotland, much less to proclaim the Truce there. He even treated very roughly the Superior of the Cordeliers of Berwick, sent to him by the Legates and who using Surprize, had been so bold as to publish in some measure the Truce, in the Presence of several Scots. Instead therefore of obeying the Pope, he besieged and took Berwick by the Treachery of the Governor (6), if the English are to be credited. This Contempt for the Pope's Orders, obliged the Legates to excommunicate him, and put his Kingdom under an Interdict. But he did not much regard a Curse so manifestly unjust to him, and so very partial to the English. Therefore continuing his Progress he advanced on the Borders of England, and committed great Ravages without meeting any Opposition (7).

Edward found then, that the spiritual Weapons of the Pope were but of little Service. Accordingly, on a sudden altering his Methods, he found means to raise an Army, with which he would go and attempt the recovery of Berwick. Whilft he was employed in the Siege, the Earl of Murray, the King of Scotland's General, made a Diversion in England, which proved very fatal to the Borders. In his return from ravaging several Counties, he met a Body of English Militia to the Number of ten Thousand, with the Archbishop of York (8), at their Head. Though his Forces were not near so numerous as those of the Enemies, he courageously charged them, and obtained over these undisciplined Troops a Victory (1), which destroyed above half. The Scots called this Action, The white Battle, from some English Prædors being killed in the Fight with their Surplices on. This Accident obliged Edward to raise the Siege of Berwick. Shortly after, with much Solicitation, he obtained a Truce for two Years; whereupon he left the North, and returned to London, where he was no less unfortunate.

The Truce restored not to England the expected Tranquillity. Hardly was it proclaimed, before the Kingdom was involved in fresh Troubles, much more violent than those caused by Gaveston. The Enmity between the King and the Barons was still kept alive, like Fire under Cinders, and only wanted a fresh occasion to rekindle. Unhappily, an occasion was but too ready (2). The Lords, ever jealous of those about the King's Person, had introduced into Court a young Gentleman, Hugh Spencer, whom they believed entirely devoted to their Interests. They had procured him the Office of King's Chamberlain, with a design to make use of him as a Spy, in order to be informed of what passed at Court, where they seldom appeared. But their Project turned against themselves. Spencer had a Father named Hugh, as well as himself, a Person of Courage and good Sense, who gave him quite contrary Instructions. He intimated to him, it would be much more easy to make his Fortune, by labouring directly for himself, than by serving the Barons; and with a little Patience and Obsequiousness, he might render himself superior to those, whom he looked upon as his Protectors. Spencer the Son being inclined to follow this Advice, found at first great Difficulties. The King could not behold with a good Eye, a Domestick who had already shown too great an Inclination for his Enemies. Nevertheless in time, and by the prudent Counsels of his Father, Spencer removed by degrees, the ill Impressions, his Master had taken against him. As his design was to govern the King entirely, he scrupled not to become for some time his Slave, by showing on all occasions, that he was wholly devoted to him. By this blind Obsequiousness, and by a general Compliance to whatever was agreeable to him, from his Spy, he became his Confidant, and at length supplied in his Heart the Place formerly possessed by Gaveston. When he saw himself in this great degree of Favour, he made an ill use of it, like his Predecessor, and by his excessive Pride and insatiable Avarice, made it soon witheld, that Gaveston had not been oppress'd. Hugh his Father, whom he had caused to be created Earl of Winchester (3), had been till then of a quite different Character. Nothing could be laid to his Charge but unbecoming a Man of Honour and Honesty. In all the Posts he had been promoted to, by this and the late King, he had always behaved with great Moderation, Prudence and Impartiality. But he knew not how to preserve the Reputation he had acquired. A blind Fondness for his Son, and Ambition, which had seized him in his old Age, threw him into those Excesses which rendered both him and his Son odious to the Nation, and particularly to the Nobility. It was not long before an universal Discontent became visible. The Earl of Lancaster, a great Favorite of the People, and a sworn Enemy to the King, notwithstanding their outward Reconciliation, had improved these Junctures, to form a Party capable of ranning the two Favorites (4). He had demonstrated to his Friends, "That their Ruin and his own were infallible, if means were not found to remove the Spencers from Court: That the King, who harboured a secret Desire of Revenge, was indeed incapable of managing a Design: but that every thing was to be feared from that Prince, assisted by his two new Ministers, of much greater Abilities than Gaveston."

"He added, these Ministers were no less guilty than the other, of divers Encroachments on the Privileges of the People, and that all the Endeavours hitherto used, to reduce the Royal Authority within due Bounds, would be fruitless, if the King was suffered to return to his former Courses, and trample upon the Liberties of the Subject". These Reasons, alledged by a Prince, who passed for a disinterested and zealous Assertor of the publick Good, and joined to the Envy raised by the Advancement of the Spencers, caused so sudden an Effect, that the old Association was renewed. As the confederate Barons (5) had every thing to fear from the Abilities of the Ministers, they lost no time, which was so precious, in presenting to the King Petitions (6), as they had done concerning Gaveston. Such a Conduct would only have given their Enemies leisure to prepare. And therefore, without discovering their Intentions, they resolved to levy Troops with all possible Secrecy and Expedition, and to surprize the King and his Favorites, before they had time to take any measures. This Design was executed with that Speed, that in a very short space, they drew together eleven thousand Men, with whom they ventured to take the Field. Their first Exploit was to plunder the Lands of the Spencers, which was left to the Care of Roger Mortimer the Younger, so called to distinguish him from his Uncle of the same Name. He discharged his Commission in so violent a manner, and with so little regard for the Favorites, that he did them in a few Days threefold thousand Pounds damage. This done, the Barons sent some of their Body (7) to present a Petition to the King, desiring the Removal of the Spencers (8). Edward perceiving it was not in his Power to curb their Boldness, referred the Matter to the Parliament. He did not question, but he should have Interest enough with the Commons, to protect the two Ministers. But the Barons Resolution to continue in Arms, broke all his Measures. Several Members of Parliament being at the Devotion of the Lords, others awed by the Army, and all in general having too little value for the Spencers, to run any hazard for their sake, the two Favorites were banished the Realm, without the King being able to screen them (9). This Parliament was called, The Parliament of the white Bands, on account of certain white Marks, by which the Adherents of the Barons were to know one another. Whatever Endeavours the King used to oppose these violent Proceedings, he found himself constrained to give way to a Torrent, which he could not withstand. Spencer, the Father, being then out of the Realm upon the King's Affairs, the Son was ignominiously conducted to Dover, where he was shipped off with great Threats, if ever he pretended to set foot in the Kingdom again.

Edward highly repented this Affront, and swore to be revenged. But perhaps means would have been found to appease him, if the Queen, who, on the like Occasions, was wont to act the Part of a Mediatix between the King and the Barons, had not ceased doing them that good Office. Instead of endeavouring to allay the King's Anger, she took care to excite him to Vengeance, being exasperated at an Affront, she lately received from a Baron, and of which she cast the Blame upon the whole Party. The Occasion of her Repentment was this:

Whilst Edward was thus incensed against the Barons, Isabella, desiring to go in Pilgrimage to Canterbury, sent by one of some of her Domesticks before, to provide Lodgings in the Castle of Leids, belonging to Bertholomeu de Badlesmere, one of the associated Barons. As the whole Party were then in extreme distrust of the King, the Officer who commanded in the Castle, denied the Queen's People Admission. There was even one of them killed. So far was Badlesmere from disclaiming what was done, upon Complaint made to him, that he had the boldness to write

When a Man reflects on the great Credit of the Spaniards, their reverful Temper, and the reason they had personally to hate Morimer, he muſt be convinced, that the Protection which ſcreened him from their Vengeance, was very powerful. On the other hand, if all the Circumſtances of this Reign be conſidered, it will not be thought likely, that any other Perſon but the King, could poſſibly obtain ſuch a Power from the King, againſt the Interpoſition of the Solicitations of the Miniſters. This Conjecture is confirmed by the ſcandalous manner in which Prince afterwards lived with Morimer.

The Death of this Prince, and of several other Lords of the same Party, placed the Spencers on the Top of the Wheel. As there was now no Man able to oppose them, these two Ministers did, in the King's Name, whatever they thought agreeable with their Interests, without regarding a Party entirely reduced. Hence they began to grow so moderate their Passion, and to themselves the Pleasure of Revenge, they would have doubtless supported themselves in their high Station, had not their Master to pass an easy and quiet Life. But where are Men of this Character to be found? These Spencers, to complicate their more fatal Troubles, than which grew lately appeased. Not content with putting to death the Heads of the opposite Party, with depriving others of their Estates, and with condemning great numbers to perpetual Banishment, they believed themselves yet unsafe, till they were rid of three Persons who made them

1123. from whence it may be inferred, their good Understanding commenced long before it was publicly known. For a further Confirmation of this, may be added what all the Historians unanimously relate, that the Queen incessantly complained of the Severities, exercised upon the Friends of the late Earl of Lancaster. This gave occasion to presume, that Mortimer was the principal Subject of her Complaints. Moreover, at this very Time it was, that the Spencers began to vex Queen Isabella, inasmuch, that by their Persecutions, they obliged her to complain to the King of France her Brother, that she was regarded but as a Servant in the King her Husband's House. Now it does not appear, that the Favorite, had any other Reason to mortify her, than the Protection she granted to Mortimer their Enemy. All these Reasons incline me to believe, there was at this Time a Familiarity between Isabella and Mortimer, and that the Protection she publicly bestowed him with, drew upon her the Malice of the Favorites. The Vexation they gave her, led her to seek means to be revenged in her turn. This is truly the Source of the Events we are going to relate, concerning which Historians have expressed themselves very obscurely. Let us add here, in order not to return to Mortimer till there shall be occasion, that quickly after he found means to escape out of the Tower (1), and he concealed some Time in England, notwithstanding the diligent Search that was made to apprehend him. Though Hie and Cry was raised after him, which seldom fails of Success, he had the good Fortune to escape the Search, and retire into France. Probably, he was hid in some Place where they durst not look for him. Let us now proceed to the fatal Effects of the Love, Ambition, and Revenge, which at that Time possessed the Minds of the principal Persons at Court.

The Peace made by Edward I. with France still subsisted, notwithstanding certain Disputes between the two Crowns, in the Reigns of Louis Hutin, and Philip le Fair, Sons and Successors of Philip the Fair. Upon Charles the Fair's Ascention to the Throne of France, after the Death of his Brothers, these Differences were considerably increased, on account of the Jurisdiction claimed by that Prince over Guienne, as Sovereign Lord of that Duchy. It is probable too that Charles, dissatisfied at the ill Treatment of his Sister Queen Isabella in England, sought occasion to give Edward Marks of his Resentment. An unexpected Accident in Guienne, gave him an opportunity to make himself Satisfaction. Hence flowed all those Misfortunes which afterwards fell upon the King of England.

At a Town in Agenois, called St. Sardas, held of the Castle of Montpezat, some Outrage was committed, which Edward's Officers in Guienne neglected to redress (2). Whereupon the Parties concerned carried their Complaints to the King of France, as Sovereign. Charles embraced this opportunity to improve his Right over Guienne. He caused the Court of Peers to sentence the Lord of Montpezat, and other Gasccon Gentlemen to Banishment, and confiscate their Castles to the Crown of France. By virtue of this Sentence, given without summoning the King of England, or his Officers, Charles would have taken possession of the Castle of Montpezat; but was prevented by the English, who placed a strong Garrison there. This opposition occasioned another Sentence, declaring the Garrison guilty of Felony, for opposing the Execution of the first. Mean while, the King of France ordered Troops to be raised in Perigord, and the neighbouring Provinces, with design to besiege the Castle. To give the better colour to this Armament, he complained, that Edward had not done him Homage for Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu (3), and so had a Pretence ready to prosecute these Provinces, in case his Arms met with the expected Success. Indeed it was visible, his Design was not to take a Castle only, since he sent a formidable Army into Guienne, under the Command of Charles de Valois his Uncle, who made himself Master of several Places. Certain it is, nothing was farther from Edward's Thoughts, than a desire of entering into a War with France, and yet he took no Method to avoid it. Instead of giving the King his Brother-in-law some Satisfaction, by doing Justice to the Parties concerned in the Affair of St. Sardas, and by offering the Homage due to him, he still kept his Character of neglecting great Matters for the sake of Trifles (4). It is true indeed, he sent Commissioners into Guienne (5), with publick Orders to make Inquisition concerning the Business of St. Sardas. But by their private Instructions, they were to do their utmost to oblige the Plaintiffs to desist from their Appeal, which was not endeavouring to satisfy the King of France. As for the Homage, though he did not pretend to dispute it, he excused himself from doing it, on pretence he had never been summoned in Form. Mean time, he sent his Brother, the Earl of Kent, to command in Guienne, but with so few Troops, that the Earl not daring to keep the Field, shut himself up in Reole, where he was besieged, and at last forced to capitulate.

Before the Earl of Kent went over to Guienne, he was sent to Paris, to try to adjust the Difference between the two Crowns. He had even agreed with the Court of France upon a Treaty, which the King of France's Brother refused to ratify. This was the Subject of a long Negotiation, which served only to give the Earl of Valois time to pursue his Conquests in Guienne. At length, Edward perceiving the Dutchy was in manifest danger, thought fit to make some Preparations, which occasioned the Court of France to equip a Fleet, to oppose that of the English. The Spencers, ever watchful of occasions to vex Isabella, used this to deprive her of the Earldom of Cornwall, assigned her for her private Expences. They suggested to the King, that it was dangerous to leave that Country in the Hands of the Queen, when he was in War with the King her Brother. They added, that probably, the Fleet the French were fitting out, was designed for an Invasion from that quarter. This was sufficient to induce Edward to resume that Earldom in a very dishonouring manner to the Queen, without dissembling that he thought her capable of holding a criminal Correspondence with the Enemies of the State (6). This Indignity, which the highly resent, added to so many other Reasons of Dispute against the Spencers and the King, in all likelihood, hastened the Project, the Particulars whereof I am going to relate.

Though Edward made some Preparations for War, it was not by the Force of his Arms that he expected the Restitution of what was taken from him. His chief Reliance was on the Pope, who being chosen Mediator between the two Crowns, put him in hopes of a good Issue to this Affair. To work this Agreement, the Pope sent two Nuncios to Paris (7), where Ambassadors from England (8) also repaired. But the Negotiation went on so slowly, that the English could not help showing some Impatience. As they seemed inclined to return home, a Person of great Note in the Court of France took occasion to insinuate to the Nuncios, that if the King of England would send his Queen to Paris, she would undoubtedly obtain from the King her Brother, much better Terms than the Ambassadors could expect. The Nuncio's having made this Proposal to the English Plenipotentiaries, it was resolved that one of them, the Bishop of Winchester (9), should take a Journey to London, to persuade their Master to follow the method suggested to them. These Particulars are to be seen in a Letter from Edward to the Pope on this Occasion, inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. It was not therefore a Contrivance invented by the Spencers to be rid of the Queen, as some affirm, since the Project came first from France. It is much more likely, that the Queen her self put the King her Brother upon it, in order to have an Opportunity of going to Paris, and beginning the execution of her Plot against the King her Husband and his Favorites. Be that as it will, the Proposal being debated in the Council (10), any expedient was thought preferable to a War, as Montters then flood in England. Isabella was therefore desired to go to France; to which she seemed to consent only in order to make Peace between the two Kings (1). Immediately after her Arrival at Paris, she obtained a short Truce, during which she concluded a Treaty (2) with the King her Brother. By this Treaty the Duchy of Guienne was to be wholly resigned to the King of France. That afterwards both the Kings should meet at Beauvais, where Charles, at the Instance of the Queen his Sister, should restore Guienne to Edward, upon his doing Homage for it. That in this Restitution the Country of Agensis lately conquered by France should not be included: But that the King of England should be allowed to sue for it in the Court of Peers, where Justice should be done him. And in case the Court should decree that Edward should have possession again; he should be obliged to pay the King of France a certain Sum towards the Charges of the War: but should pay nothing in case he lost his Cause. The Day after signing this Treaty, the Commissioners of France, for reasons they did not care to explain, deferred fifteen Days longer the Interview of the two Kings, which had been fixed to the Assumption of the Virgin (3).

How disadvantageous soever this Treaty appeared to Edward, as he was willing at any rate to avoid a War, he failed not to ratify it and prepare to do his Homage. The Spencers beheld these Preparations with great Uneasiness, knowing there were in the Kingdom great Numbers of Malecontents who might take advantage of the King's Absence, to excite fresh Commotions. An Expedient found out in this Interval, either in France, or in England, freed them from their Trouble. It was insinuated to the King that if he would resign to Prince Edward his Son aged thirteen Years, the Duchy of Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu, the King of France would receive the Homage of the young Prince, and restore him the Places he had promised to give up by the Treaty. In all likelihood this Overture came from the Court of France, as well as the Proposal of the Queen's going to Paris. But it was only hinted to the King like the former, in order to induce him to demand that Favour himself. However that be, as every one is apt to flatter himself, Edward imagined that, out of Respect to him, the King of France had devised this Expedient, to excuse him from doing what was very disagreeable to him, or the Queen had obtained this Favour by her Solicitations. Neither himself nor the Spencers perceived the Poison that lurked under this seemingly very advantageous Proposal. They did not question in the least, but the Management of Guienne would still remain in their hands, in the Name of the young Prince, at least during his Minority. On the other hand, the proposed Change did not appear to be beneficial to France. But for that very reason they should have suspected it: since it seldom happens that any thing advantageous is offered to another, without the Proposer's receiving some Benefit, though at first it does not appear. However, as Edward suspected not his Queen, he accepted, without Hesitation, the Offer, which executed him from a Journey he was very unwilling to make. This was, as one may say, throwing himself headlong into the Snare laid for him, the Queen's sole Aim, in the whole Contrivance, being to get the Prince her Son with her, and to make him her Instrument to ruin the King her Husband.

There is hardly room to question, that Charles the Fair was very deeply concerned in this Plot, when it is considered, that from him came the first Proposal of sending Isabella to Paris. This gives occasion to presume, he was Author of the second too, which tended to draw Prince Edward there also. And indeed, if he had not some private View, what Advantage could the Change proposed be to him? Was it not more honorable, to see the King of England at his Feet, than his Son? And yet, instead of appearing to have made any objection on this Account, it is seen in several Places of the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he very readily came into it, by the great haste wherewith this Agreement was made. The 21st of August, Edward had still thoughts of going to France. The 24th of the same Month he writ to Charles, to be excused, upon a pretended Fit of Sickness, from meeting him at Beauvais on the Day appointed. The 2d of September, he absolutely resigned to the Prince his Son the Earldom of Ponthieu (4). The 4th of the same Month, Charles signed Letter- Patent, consenting to the Substitution of the Son in his Father's Room, on condition King Ed- ward would resign to his Son whatever he held in France. But this condition was already performed in England, two Days before, with respect to the Earldom of Ponthieu. Hence it is plain, this Negotiation was begun and ended between the 24th of August and the 4th of September, which doubtless will seem too short a time, if the Court of France is supposed not to be already determined, to grant what she well knew was going to be demanded. If the Son's Substitution in the Father's Place, had been attended with no Consequence, there would have been no occasion to take much notice of it; the thing in itself being of little Moment. But it was necessary to relate the Circumstances, in order to show it was a Plot contrived long before by the Queen, and a Snare laid by her for the King her Husband, and at the same time that she acted in Concert with the King of France her Brother. For, it is very hard to believe, this Prince so politic as to draw King Charles into her Project, without his or his Council's perceiving it. It is therefore very likely, that before Isabella left England, she had intimated to the King her Brother, that she wanted to throw off the Dependence she was kept in by the Spencers, and free herself from the ill Treatment she received, by their Intiguation, from her Husband. So, it may be, very probably, presumed, it was in order to serve the Queen his Sister, that Charles could be to made indirectly the Proposer of sending her to Paris. That it was moreover in prosecution of the same Design, that he so readily came into the Treaty he concluded with her, when he might reasonably expect to become Master of Guienne. In fact, that it was with the same View, that he consented to receive the Son's, instead of the Father's Homage. It is scarcely to be doubted that the prolonging of the Term of the Homage, without giving the Reasons, was a Consequence of the same Project. It was believed, without doubt, there would be need of more time, to prevail with Edward to send his Son to Paris, to which it was imagined he would make some Objections. To all these reasons may be farther added, that afterwards Charles permitted the Queen his Sister to stay in France, notwithstanding the repeated Instances of her Husband to the contrary. Moreover the French Historians own themselves, he had promised her Assistance. Add to this, Isabella's Hatred of Spencer the younger, and her Passion for Mortimer, which she took no further care to conceal, when she had the Prince her Son in her Power. Moreover let the Reader be considered, wherewith all the English Lords declared for her, when it was time, as we shall see presently. From the Connexion of all these Circumstances it is demonstrable, that Isabella's Plot was formed before her Departure from England, and that the King her Brother was not ignorant of it. I have dwelt the longer on these Particulars, because the Historians seem to me to speak very obscurely of the Causes of the Revolution, I am going to relate.

The two Kings being agreed upon the expedient proposed, Prince Edward departed for Paris on the 12th of September 1325 (5), after receiving from his Father the absolute Grant of the Duchy of Guienne and Earldom of Ponthieu. In a few days after his Arrival (6), he did Homage to the King his Uncle, who actually restored him Guienne (7) but kept Agensis, of which Edward the Father greatly complained. He pretended, that by the late Agreement Charles was obliged to restore all Guienne to his Son. Charles, on the contrary, maintained, that the restitution he had promised, had relation to the late Treaty, whereby he reserved Agensis for himself. This Contest displeased not the Queen, who wanted a Pretence to stay at Paris, from whence she did not intend to soon to depart. After the Arrival of the Prince her Son, all the English who had fled for refuge into France, or been banished their own Country, came to her. Roger Mortimer was of this Number, and became her chief Counsellor. From thenceforward Edward's Ambassadors had but little access to the Queen, and were no longer advised with, concerning the Affairs of the restitution of Agensis. On the contrary, she held frequent Councils, where none were admitted but the professed Enemies of the King her Husband, and of the Spencers. Nay she had secret Conferences with Mortimer, which occasioned many Suspicions. In fine, she came to use so little discretion in her Familiarities with him, that Edward's Servants at Paris were extremely offended thereat. On the other hand, her Return to England was deferred from Day to Day, on divers pretences, notwith-

Charles the Fair, as the French Historians are forced to own, had promised the Queen his Sister some Assistance, but was unwilling it should appear he was concerned in her Plots (4). It was necessary therefore for Isabella to find a Protector, who would not scruple openly to support her Interests. To that end, she applied to the Earl of Hainault, from whom she believed she should be able to procure some Troops, to strengthen her Party upon her Arrival in England. But as she could not expect to gain that Prince, without making it turn to his advantage, she concluded with him a marriage between her Son Edward and his Daughter Philippa, as if it had been in her power to dispose of the young Prince. Several pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts plainly shew, this marriage was in hand whilst the Queen was yet at Paris. Amongst others, there was a Letter of King Edward to his Son, expressly forbidding him, to enter into any Marriage-Engagement without his Knowledge.

Mean time the King of France still permitted Isabella to continue at Paris, and read without any Emotion, or Answer, Edward's Letters, upbraiding him with Breach of Faith. The Information, Edward received from the Bishop of Exeter, the Queen's frivolous Excuses to defer her Return, and King Charles's connivance, troubled him extremely. He plainly saw, some Plot was contriving against him at Paris, tho' he could not tell what it was. But he was very sensible, the consequences were to be dreaded, as long as the Prince his Son was in the hands of his Enemies.

Most of the Historians affirm, the Contempt shown by the Mother and Son for his Orders, induced him at length to banish them the Realm. But a Letter, he sent the Pope on that Subject, manifestly shews, it was only a false rumour spread in France, on purpose to justify the Queen's stay. In the Letter Edward told the Pope, That he had never such a Thought: That the tender Age of his Son freed him from all Imputation of Disobedience, of which the Queen alone was guilty, and that he had to great an Affection for both, to treat them so inhumanly. After trying in vain all the ways he could devise, to oblige them to return to England, he turned his whole Fury upon the Ambassadors, who assisted the Queen in the negotiation of the fatal Treaty, and resolved to make them responsible for the Issue. He particularly charged the Bishop of Norwich and Earl of Richmond, with prevaricating in the execution of their Orders (5), wherein he committed two egregious Mistakes. First, as he increased thereby the number of his Enemies, who were already too numerous. Secondly, as he discovered his Incapacity to govern his Kingdom, since, as a minor King might have done, he cast on his Minister the blame which he himself had incurred, by ratifying the Treaty. This Conduct could not fail to give his Enemies a great advantage; whose chief aim was to persuade the People, the King was very unfit to govern. To this imprudent Proceeding, he added another, no less impolitic, in declaring War against France, without being in any readiness to maintain it; and in giving Charles a plausible pretence openly to support his Sister's Interests (6).

As Isabella's project to dethrone the King her Husband has something detestable in it, the French Historians would fain insinuate that Charles the Fair her Brother was no way concerned in it. On the contrary, they affirm, that when he came to know it, he expelled her his Dominions, and forbid his Knights to give her any Assistance. They would have spoke the whole Truth, if they had said, he did not do this, till Isabella had taken all her measures with the Earl of Hainault, and was upon the point of executing her design. Menzies could not help discovering his thoughts, when he said the Spencers were so liberal of their Money at the Court of France, that Charles, gained by presents, or awed by the Threats of a Rupture, prohibited his Subjects from assisting the Queen. It is true he adds, that because Mortimer, who had made his Escape out of the Tower, was come to Queen Isabella at Paris, Charles detesting their shameful Proceedings, would not suffer her any longer in his Dominions. But it is easy to see, the French King was not swayed by that Motive, since it is not true, that Mortimer followed the Queen into France, where he had been two Years before her. On the contrary, it is certain, Charles suffered his whole Court, above sixteen Months, to be witness of the Familiarities between his Sister and Mortimer. And if he sent her afterwards out of his Territories, it was purely on account of the Uncertainty of the Issue, and to avoid the Blame of having approved of her Conduct, in case she did not succeed.

Isabella leaving the Court of France, passed some days at Abbeville, from whence she came to Valenciennes, and thence upon her Arrival, she ratified the Treaty concluded between her and the Earl of Hainault, and contracted her Son Edward to the Princess Philippa. A few Days after, she repaired to Dart, where she embarked the Troops supplied by the Earl of Hainault, who were all ready there, with Ships to transport them. John de Hainault, Brother of the Earl, had the Command; and the Queen, as a singular favour, gave him leave to stile himself her Knight. Some reckon these Troops but three thousand Men (7). Others say, they were much more numerous. But she did not rely so much upon these Forces, as upon the Discontents of the English, and the many Adherents procured her by her Friends in England. She landed on the 22d of September [at Orwell] in Suffolk, where she was joined by Henry of Lancaster, and several other Lords (8). At the same time, the Enemies of the Spencers were very busy in levying Troops to come to her assistance; and her Army soon became so numerous, that she struck Terror into those who were desirous to serve the King. That unfortunate Prince, who had received timely notice that a Plot was contrived against him at Paris, had, according to custom, employed himself in seeking ineffectual Remedies for the impending Evils. Instead of raising an Army, and equipping a Fleet, which might have qualified the Design of his Enemies, he had only writ to the Pope and the King of France, Letters which were to no manner of purpose. Wherefore, upon the Arrival of the foreign Troops, he was deserted by all, and unable to withstand his Enemies. In vain did he publish a Proclamation, commanding his Subjects to fall upon the Foreigners, and let a Price upon Mortimer's Head (1); not a Man stirred to obey him. The Earl of Kent, his own Brother, sided with the Male-contents, and went over to the Queen. In this Extremity he resolved to retire into the West, with the two Spencers, the Earl of Arundel, Chancellor Balz, Simon de Reading, and a few other Adherents of the Favorites.

Mean time, the Queen, whose Army daily increased by the Troops brought her from Paris, published a Manifesto in her own, as well as in the Names of Edward her Son, and the Earl of Kent, setting forth the Reasons of their taking Arms. They pretended, their sole Aim was to free the Church and State, from the Oppressions to which they were liable, by the Male-Administration of the King, and the Tyranny of the Spencers. Adding, these unworthy Favorites and their Adherents, ought to be deemed Enemies of the State, since by their pernicious Counsel, and Abuse of the Royal Authority, they unjustly deprived, some of their Lives, others of their Estates and Liberty; without any regard to the Laws of the Land, or the Privileges of the People. This Manifesto was published at Wallingford, October the 15th, whilst the Queen was marching in pursuit of the King.

Edward was then little able to withstand his Enemies. All his Endeavours to raise Troops had proved ineffectual: No body would expose himself to the Queen's Retribution, or hazard his Life and Fortune for an unhappy Prince, who was now looked upon as lost. In this Extremity, finding no remedy in England, he resolved to retire into Ireland, and leave Spencer, the Father, in Bristol. He fancied, the Siege of that Place would so long employ the Queen, that he should have time to take some measures. Pursuant to this Resolution, he went on board a small Vessel, and set sail for Ireland. But he was driven by contrary Winds on the Coast of Wales, where he was forced to land; and he concealed in the Abbey of Neath, till the Wind became fair, or he could form some other Design. Whilst this unhappy Prince could hardly find in his own Kingdom a Place of Safety, the Queen over-ran the Counties with a wonderful Rapidity. Every one was eager to supply her Army with Necessaries. At length she came before Bristol, where Spencer made but a faint Resistance. The City surrendering after a few Days Siege, the old Gentleman, aged fourscore and ten Years, was immediately hung up [in his Armour,] without any Formality (2).

Mean while, the City of London following the Example of the rest of the Kingdom, declared for the Queen. In vain did [Walter de] Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter, whom the King had left Guardian of the City, endeavour to keep it for his Master. His Efforts served only to excite against him the Fury of the Populace, who treating him with great Indignity, at length cut off his Head (3). The Citizens likewise, enraged against the King, became Masters of the Tower, and released all the Prisoners confined by the Spencers (4).

At Bristol, where the Queen staid some Days, she was informed of the King's being embarked for Ireland. As he had not committed the Government to any Person, the Lords who attended the Queen, used that pretence, to name for Guardian, or Regent of the Kingdom, Prince Edward (5), who took upon him the Administration. This done, the Queen came to Gloucester, where the Gates were opened to her. Here she published a Proclamation, inviting the King to come and resume the Government: but herein she acted not with Sincerity. She not only had no Intention to re-instate the King, but very well knew he never would venture to place any Confidence in her, after being so cruelly treated.

Whilst the Queen was at Gloucester, a Report being spread that the King was somewhere concealed in Wales, Henry of Lancaster was detached in quest of him. His Diligence, and a Reward of two thousand Pounds promised by the Queen, to any Person that should take Spencer the younger, soon gained him Intelligence of the Place, where, the unhappy King thought to be conceal'd (6). He had with him only Spencer, Chancellor Balz, Simon de Reading, and a few Domestic, all the rest forsaking him in his Misfortunes. As the Abbey of Neath was no proper place to keep the Prisoners, Henry of Lancaster carried them to Monmouth Castle till farther Orders (7). When the Queen heard that the King her Husband, and her principal Enemies were in her Power, she held a Council, to know how she was to behave at this juncture. It was resolved in the Council, that the Bishop of Hereford should be sent to demand the Great-Seal of the King, as well to hinder him from using it against the Queen, as to be able to call a Parliament; without which nothing could be done but what would want a lawful Authority. If what had hitherto passed, discovered to the King the Designs of his Enemies, this last Circumstance fully convinced him, he should be no longer regarded, since by taking from him the Great-Seal, he was deprived at the same time of the Exercise of the Royal Authority. He delivered it however, without showing any Reluctance, and gave the Queen and the Prince his Son Power to use it as they pleased, even in Matters of mere Grace. This was the last Act of Authority performed by this Prince, who shortly after was conducted to Kenilworth Castle.

When the Queen had the Great-Seal in her possession, she used it to her own Advantage, as well to order the Payment of her Debts, as to call a Parliament in the captive King's Name. She had not patience to stay till the meeting of the Parliament, to be revenged upon Spencer and the rest of her Enemies. The Earl of Arundel (8) had now lost his Head by her Orders at Hereford; where she had a mind to sacrifice the others to her Vengeance. She marched to that City, ordering the Prisoners to be conducted in a most ignominious manner, to expose them all the way to the Insults and Curses of the People. As soon as she arrived, she caused Spencer and Simon de Reading to be brought to their Tryals; of whom the first was hanged on a Gibbet, fifty Foot high, and the other ten Foot lower. As for Chancellor Balz, as he was in Holy Orders, and it was not safe to proceed against him in this same manner, he was delivered to the Bishop of Hereford, and carried to London. But in entering the City, the Mob fell upon him, and terribly abusing him, threw him into Newgate, where he died of the Blows he had received.

The Favorites and Ministers having thus received the Reward of their Pride and Cruelty, the Queen came to London, to take new measures concerning the Parliament which was to meet. She entered the City in triumph, amidst the Acclamations of the People, who called her their Deliverer, and expressed their Thankfulness, for the pretended Service she had done the State. The Parliament meeting, in January (9) 1327, the first thing taken into consideration, was the deposing of the King, for which every one was now so prepared, that the unfortunate King had not so much as a single Advocate to plead for him. It was unanimously resolved, the King should be deposed, and his Son Edward made King in his room. The Heads of the Charge exhibited against him, were digested into several Articles, of which some were very much aggravated, and others only bare Repetition, in order to swell the Number. In general, he was accused, of not having governed according to the Laws of the Land; of having made use of ill Counsellors, and rejecting the Advice of his faithful Subjects. [The Articles at length were (10):

"V. Also, Whereas he was bound by his Oath to do Right to all, he would not do it, for his own Profit, and the Covetousness of him and his evil Counsellors which were with him; neither regarded the other Points of the Oath which he made at his Coronation, as he was obliged."

"VI. Also, he abandoned his Realm, and did as much as he could to destroy it and his People; and what is worse, by his Cruelty, and the default of his Person, he is found incorrigible, without hopes of Amendment. All which Things are so notorious, they cannot be gainsaid."

This Act passing Nemine Contradicente, young Edward was proclaimed King in Westminster-Hall, by the Name of Edward III. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury preached a Sermon on these words, The Voice of the People, the Voice of God; wherein he endeavoured to vindicate what the Parliament had done, and exhorted the People to pray to the King of Kings for their new Sovereign.

When the News of this rigorous Sentence was brought to the Queen, she seemed to be extremely moved, even to the bursting out into Tears. But her outward Grief little agreed with all her Proceedings to dethrone her Husband; much less with her Passion for Mortimer, of which she gave such publick Marks, that it was impossible to be mistaken. The Prince her Son, whose Youth made him less suspicious, was perhaps the only Person that was affected with her counterfeit Tears. Urged by his generous Inclinations, he solemnly vowed not to accept the Crown during the King his Father's Life, without his express Consent. This Vow somewhat broke the Measures of the Parliament. They were afraid Edward the Father would persist in keeping the Title of King, though stript of all his Authority. In this Perplexity, it was deemed absolutely necessary, to oblige him to resign his Crown to the Prince his Son. Pursuant to this Resolution, the Bishops of Lincoln and Hersford were sent to prepare him. Then the Parliament nominated twelve Commissioners; namely, three Bishops, three Earls, two Barons, two Abbots, and two Judges (1); to whom was added Judge Trussell, as the Nation's particular Procurator, to declare to him, that the People of England were no longer bound by their Oath of Allegiance, and to receive his Resignation. Nothing showed so much their Repentment against the unfortunate King, as their Choice of the two first Bishops (2), whom he had all along looked upon as his Enemies, and who indeed discharged their Commission very rudely. Instead of giving him Consolation, they insulted over his Misfortunes, in endeavouring to persuade him, he was deposed for his own Good, and to ease him of the great Weight of the Government, that he might live more happily than he had hitherto done. But as their malicious Discourse made no great Impression upon him, they plainly told him, unless he complied with the Parliament, his Condition would be rendered more unfortunate: Adding, his Obstinacy would be a great Prejudice to his Family; for, if he refused to resign the Crown to his Son, the Nation was resolved to elect a King, not of the Royal Family. Upon these words, they withdrew, in order to give him time to consider of his Answer to the Commissioners, who were coming to receive his Resignation.

At the Arrival of the Commissioners, the unfortunate King came out from his Bed-Chamber in a Mourning-Gown, with Looks demonstrating his inward Trouble. As he was acquainted with the occasion of their coming, the sight of that formidable Power, which had just spoiled him of Royalty, made such an Impression upon his Mind, that he fell into a Swoon, from whence he could hardly recover. As soon as he came to himself, the Commissioners told him their Message, and represented to him, the ill Consequences of his Refusal. Then, whatever was required of him, with the greater religion, as he acknowledged, his Sins were the sole cause of his Misfortunes. He added moreover, that he could not behold without extreme Grief, the Aversion his People had for him; but if his Sorrow could admit of any Comfort, it was from the consideration of his Subjects Goodness to his Son, for which he returned them Thanks.

After this Answer, he proceeded to the Ceremony of his Resignation, by delivering to them the Crown, Sceptre, and the other Emblems of Royalty. Then Sir William Trussell, addressing himself to the King, spoke in this manner, making use of a Form of his own, in a case where there was no Precedent to follow. I William Trussell, Procurator of the Prelates, Earls, Barons, and People in my Procuracy named, having for this full and sufficient Power, do surrender unto you Edward, late King of England, the Homage and Fealty of the Persons aforesaid, and do acquit the same, in the best manner the Law and Custom can give it, and do make this Protestation, in the Name of all those that will not be in your Faith or Allegiance for the future, nor claim or hold any Thing of you as King, but account you as a private Person, without any manner of Royal Dignity (3). After these Words, the High-Steward, [Sir Thomas Blunt] broke his Staff, and declared all the King's Officers discharged from his Service. Thus ended the Reign of Edward II, in the forty third Year of his Age, having lasted nineteen Years, six Months and fifteen Days.

This Prince had a very mean Genius, which permitted him not to distinguish what was for his Advantage, from what was hurtful to him. He followed his Humour, without troubling himself about the Consequences, and without being able to remedy the Misfortunes he thereby drew on himself. Though he had many Failings, he may be affirmed to be more weak than wicked. To sum up his Character in a few Words, he was exceeding like his Grandfather Henry III. Edward his Father, a much wiser Prince than he, and taught by the Misfortunes of the two Kings his immediate Predecessors, ever avoided, as a most dangerous Rock, all occasion of Quarrel with the Nobility; chusing rather to give way a little, than hazard his quiet to gratify his Repentment. The Son had not a sufficient Capacity to follow so good an Example, or to improve by his Instructions. He gave up himself entirely to his Favorites, and chose rather to forfeit the Affection of his People, than deny himself the Satisfaction of heaping Favours on those he loved. His Weakness and Incapacity drew on him the Contempt of his Subjects, which was soon changed into hatred, when he was seen to sacrifice all to his Passions. He had the Misfortune to have a beautiful and amorous Wife, who giving way to an infamous Passion, completed his Ruin, for fear perhaps of being herself prevented. Certainly, he was treated too severely by his Subjects, whose Insolence increased in proportion to their Sovereign's Weakness. One cannot observe without wonder, that there was not a single Person willing to draw his Sword in his Defence. I shall not undertake to determine how far, in those Days, the Rights of the People, with regard to the King, might extend. I shall only say, there was no Precedent to follow, for this is the first Instance, in the English History, of a King deposed by his Subjects, at least since the Conquest. Edward II is taxed with being given to drink. Some speak of his Fondness for Gaweston, so as to make it believed very Criminal. Others, on the contrary, commend him for his Continency. And indeed, we do not find he had any Mistress or Bastards, like some of his Predecessors. He founded Oriel-College and St. Mary-Hall in Oxford (4), and built a Monastery for Friars on his Estate at Langley.

He had by Isabella of France two Sons, and two Daughters. The eldest of his Sons was Edward III, his

BOOK X.

The Reigns of EDWARD III., and RICHARD II., Containing, the Space of Seventy Three Years: With a DISSERTATION on the Salick-Law, and the State of the Church from 1272 to 1399.

II. EDWARD III. Surnamed of WINDSOR.

HE deposing of Edward II procured not the English all the Happinesses they were made to expect. If they saw themselves freed from the Troubles that disturbed the late Reign, it was only to fall into a no less incommodious State. The Government of a weak and imprudent King was not more dangerous than that of a minor Prince, under the Direction of a passionate Mother, and a young unexperienced Minister, more presumptuous and less able than the Spencers. Accordingly the People quickly found, that they had not gained much by the Change. Happily for them, Edward's Minority was of no long Continuance. As soon as the young Prince had taken the Government upon himself, he converted the Misfortunes of the late Reign into Blessings, and the Injuries received from France and Scotland, into Glory and Triumphs. A remarkable Instance, which shews, that the prosperous Condition of a State depends less on its own Strength, than on the Prudence of him that sits at the Helm. This is what we are going to see in the present Reign, which is justly ranked amongst the most illustrious of the English History.

When the Commissioners sent to Kenilworth, were returned with Edward II's Resignation, the Prince his Son was again proclaimed, under the Name of Edward III., and crowned a few Days after (1). The Queen and Mortimer, whose Interest it was to make the whole Nation Accomplishers of their violent Proceedings, affected on that occasion, to cause a Coronation-Medal to be struck, importing the universal Consent of the People to the present Revolution. On one Side was the young King crowned, laying his Scepter on a heap of Hearts, with this Motto, POPULO DAT JURÁ VOLENTI. On the Reverse, a Hand held forth, as it were saving a Crown falling from on high, with these Words, NON RAPIT SED RECIPIT (2).

Though Edward was but in his fifteenth Year (3), he had already a mature Judgment, and a Penetration uncommon to that Age. However, in Compliance to the Laws of the Land, the King must have Governors, and the State Regents. The Parliament (4) chose twelve from among the Bishops, Earls, and Barons, of whom Henry of Lancaster was declared the Chief (5). The Queen opposed not this Nomination. But as she had the Power in her own Hands, she seized the Government, and shared it only with her Creatures. Roger Mortimer, who had as great an Influence over her, as Spencer the Son had over the late King, executed the Office of Prime Minister, and managed the Affairs of the Kingdom according to his Pleasure. As the Parliament was at the Queen's Devotion, she procured the Grant of a Dower, exceeding

The Animosity shewn by the Parliament in their Proceedings against Edward II, encouraged such as were Sufferers whilst the Spencers were in Power, to petition to be reformed to their Estates and Honours. Their Petitions met with a favorable Reception. The Parliament, willing to justify their late Conduct, reversed all the Judgments passed in the foregoing Reign, as well against the late Earl of Lancaster (1) and his Adherents, as against those that favoured the Designs of the Queen. It was pretended, they were contrary to Law, and manifestly extorted by the Credit of the Favourites. Perhaps this gave occasion to some Historians to say, that Edward III was pleased to begin his Reign with a General Pardon. But if by this General Pardon be meant the reversing the forementioned Judgments, the Honour of it is not to be ascribed to the King. He not only did nothing of himself, but it is certain that herein the sole Motive was to disparage the late Government, and favour the Queen's Party. For the same purpose, the King was persuaded earnestly to solicit the Court of Rome for the Canonization of the Earl of Lancaster, beheaded at Penfrith (2). He was made to say in his Letter to the Pope, that the Miracles, wrought at his Tomb, were a clear Evidence, his Punishment was a real Martyrdom. In fine, all the Proceedings of the Queen and Parliament tended solely to justify what had been done with regard to the late King, which doubtless would have been deemed very criminal if it had not been crowned with Success.

The Tranquillity England hoped to enjoy under the new King, who was in Peace or in Truce with all his Neighbours, was disturbed by an Incursion of the Scots on the Borders. Robert their King, though in an ill State of Health, and of a great Age, believed he ought not to suffer the Non-age of the King of England to pass without reaping some advantage. He was afraid likewise that a too long repose might enervate his Subjects. In his Circumstances, he thought it necessary to keep them in breath, well knowing they had to deal with formidable Enemies, who in making Truce with them, had not departed from their Pretensions. There are the most probable Reasons of this Rupture, which Buchanan justifies only by saying, it is to be supposed that Robert was swayed by powerful Motives. Be this as it will, he put the Earl of Murray (3), and Sir James Douglas at the Head of twenty thousand Men, and ordered them to ravage the Borders of England (4). Edward could not hear the News of this Irruption, without an eager Desire of signalizing himself in the Defence of his Kingdom. Though they who governed in his Name had no great Inclination for War, they did not think it for their Interest to suffer such an Insult. Their Authority might have been shaken, if on this occasion they had shewn any sign of Weakness or Cowardice.

The Opinion of the Council being agreeable to the King's Desires, an Army of sixty thousand Men was raised, including the Troops brought by John de Hainault into England. The whole Army being come to York, Edward was just going to head them, when a sudden Quarrel arose between the English and the Hainaults, wherein many were slain. As the English were the Aggressors, Justice could not be done to the Foreigners, without displeasing the Army. So the Court was forced to stay longer at York than was at first designed, in order to find means to compose this Difference, before they took the Field. This Delay gave the Scots time to pass the Fine between Carlisle and Newcastle, and to ravage in a barbarous manner the Country on this side the River. They had four thousand Men at Arms. The rest of the Troops were mounted on little swift Horses, in order the more easily to make Incursions and retreat. This News hastened the King's Departure. Though he did not know exactly where the Enemies were, he marched in quest of them, guided only by the Fire and Smoke of the Houses still burning in the Road. What speed soever he made, he could not possibly overtake them. As they had no Infantry, nor were encumbered with much Baggage, they made such extraordinary Marches, that not only they were out of the Reach of the English Army, but even at such a distance, that there was no tracing them. The Uncertainty of the Place where they were retired; causing the King to despair of meeting them, he called a Council of War. Some confused Advices-making it thought, that the Scots had not yet repassed the Tine, it was resolved to expect them beyond the River, near the Place where it was believed they would pass in their return home. This Resolve was put in execution. But the English Army had no sooner passed the Tine, than they were forced to go back again, not finding North of the River wherewithal to sublift.

During the time spent in these Marches and Counter-marches, Edward, having never received certain Intelligence of the Enemy, was extremely uneasy. As he knew not which way to go in search of them, he ordered it to be proclaimed in the Army, that whoever should bring him certain News of the Scots, should be made a Knight, with a Pension of a hundred Pounds Sterling. The Hopes of so good a Reward, set so many People to work, that it was not long before he had the desired Information (5). But it was not without some Confusion that he heard the Enemies, of whom he was so eagerly in quest, were not above two Leagues off. He marched immediately towards them, in expectation of fighting that very Day. But he did not long enjoy the Pleasure of that Expectation. The Scotch Generals, who were not ignorant of his Approach, had encamped over against Stanhope Park, on a Hill, at the foot of which run the River Were, shallow indeed, but full of Rocks, which rendered the Passage very difficult. How desirous soever Edward was of fighting, he was sensible, to his great Sorrow, that he could not attack them without exposing his Arms to manifest Danger. It was a sad thing for a young Prince, greedy of Glory, to see the Enemies so near, without being able to give them Battle. He did not however quite despair of succeeding. As he judged of their Courage by his own, he sent them word, if they would come over the River to him, he would retire at a convenient distance, and give them time to pass, and chuse what ground they should think proper, or else on the same Terms he would come over to them. The Scotch Generals answered, That the English Army being three times stronger than theirs, it would be great Rashness to accept the Proposition: That they were bent upon keeping their Post, and it was the King's Business to dislodge them, if he thought it for his Advantage to attempt it. However, as they were apprehensive, that Edward, in amusing them with his Offers, intended to pass the River at some other Place, they retired in the Night, and encamped in a more advantageous Post than what they left. Besides, that they had still the Were in their Front, their Flanks were defended by inaccessible Mountains and Bogs, which removed their Fear of being attacked, though the English had passed the River elsewhere. Edward having notice of their Motion, followed them, with the Were between him and the Enemy, and having found them posted in that manner, made them the same Offer as before, to which they returned the same Answer.

Whilst the two Armies lay in sight without being able to engage, the Lord Douglas, one of the Scotch Generals, passed the River at some distance from the two Camps, with only two hundred Horses. With this little Troop, he stole into the English Camp, and penetrated even to the Royal Tent, where he gave a terrible Alarm. Probably, his Design was to carry off the King; but not succeeding, he retired without much loss. At length, after both Armies had kept their Posts a fortnight, the English decamped in the Night, and by speedy Marches, which prevented the English from pursuing them, retired into their own Country. They were now so far off, when Edward was told of their Retreat, that he did not think fit to follow them. Several ascribed then to Mortimer the ill Success of this Campaign, and suspected him of holding Intelligence with the Enemy, to facilitate their retreat without fighting. Edward having nothing more to fear from the Scots, returned to York, extremely mortified at not being able to revenge himself. Upon his Arrival at that City, he disbanded his Army, and after magnificent Presents, sent back John de Hainault to his own Country (6).

Whilst the young King was employed in this Expedition, his Father, still closely confined in Kensworth Castle, led a melancholy Life, not being suffered to take the least Diversion. He wrote from time to time to his

I shall speak of this affair in another place. The Second was the Peace with Scotland propoſed by King Robert. Queen Jſabella and Mortimer, who held the Reins of the Government, believing a War was againſt their Interests, were very eager for a Peace. On the other hand, the King of Scotland perceiving he was no longer able to bear the hardships of War, desired to spend the residue of his days in Peace. Besides, as his Infirmities warned him of his approaching Death, he was very glad to prevent, by a Peace with the English, the Accidents which a War might cause, during the Non-age of his Son David who was but seven Years old. The Parliament being entirely in the Queen's Interest, it was not difficult to obtain their Consent, to enter upon a Treaty, which both Parties were equally desirous of concluding. The Queen-Mother, and Mortimer in behalf of the English, and Douglas in the Name of the King of Scotland, were the Managers of this Affair. A Peace was quickly made and confirmed by the Marriage of David, Prince of Scotland, with Joanna (1) Sister of Edward, though they were both Children.

The English, for the most Part, were very uneasy to see a Treaty begun, which in all Appearance, could bring them no Advantage. However, their Uneasiness would have been removed, by the hopes of the Repose it was to procure them, if, to hasten the Conclusion, Jſabella and Mortimer had not given up to the King of Scotland such Advantages, as he could not have expected, even after the gaining of many Battles. By their Advice, Edward renounced all his Pretensions to Scotland, both with regard to the Sovereignty and the Propriety (2). At the same time he reſtored to Robert, all the Charters and Instruments, which might prove the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over that Kingdom. Among these Instruments, was the famous Act, called Ragman's Roll, signed by John Balliol, and all the Barons of Scotland; wherein were contained the Rights of the Crown of England. This was followed by the Reſtitution of the Crown, Scepter, Jewels (3), which Edward I, had carried away from Edinborough, and of every thing in general which might any way testify the Sovereignty of England over Scotland. Had all this been done from a Motive of Justice and Equity, to repair, in some measure, the Injuries done by Edward I, to the Scots; far from being thought strange, such a Christian Conduct should have been highly commended. But as People were fully convinced, that the Queen and Mortimer acted not from such a Motive, and besides were prepossessed in favour of the Sovereignty established by Edward I, every one was extremely displeased with this Reſtitution. They said, "This was dearly purchasing a Peace, neither honorable nor necessary; that by this shameful Treaty, all the Money expended, and all the Blood spilt, in the Conquest of Scotland, were rendered entirely fruitless: That the Queen, who under colour of the King her Husband's Incapacity, had divested him of his Authority, plainly discovered, how unable she was herself to govern the State; and that the Faults committed by Edward II, during his whole Reign, were nothing in comparison of what she had done the very first Year of her Administration." Notwithstanding all these Murmurs, the Queen and Mortimer had Credit enough, with the Parliament (4), to cause the Peace to be confirmed, and the Sum of thirty thousand Marks, which Robert promised to pay within three Years, to be considered as a sufficient Compensation for whatever was reſtored to Scotland. Thus it frequently happens, that the very Persons who pretend to reform the Government by extraordinary Methods, shew afterwards, that they had nothing less in view than the publick Good, which served them for a Pretence.

In Consequence of the Treaty, the Nuptials of Joanna the King's Sister, were solemnized at Berwick (5). Shortly after Mortimer, as a Reward for his late pretended Service to his Master, was made Earl of March in full Parliament (6). John of Eltham, the King's Brother, was created Earl of Cornwall, and James Butler, Earl of Ormond.

Henry of Lancaster, and some other Lords (7), came not to this Parliament. They were dissatisfied that the Queen-Mother and Mortimer usurped all Authority, contrary to the Intent of the Parliament, that nominated twelve Barons to manage the publick Affairs. The tragical Death of Edward II, and the late Treaty with Scotland, furnished them with a plausible pretence to complain, they had now begun to hold private Conferences, and project a Reformation of the Government. As Secrecy was very difficult, in a Confederacy where they designed to engage a great many Persons, the Queen and Mortimer had soon notice of it. The Earl of Lancaster, whom they considered as Author of the Plot, and Head of the Malecontents, was the first Victim they resolved to sacrifice to their Safety. An Accident that happened shortly after, afforded them an opportunity, which they believed they ought to embrace, to accomplish their Design. The Earl had a private Quarrel with the Lord Holland (8), whom he looked upon as a mortal Enemy to his Family, and one of the principal Authors of the Death of Earl Thomas his Brother. Some Threats he let fall against his Enemy, induced Sir Thomas Wythers, one of his Domesticks, to revenge his Master. An opportunity offering presently after the breaking up of the Parliament, Wythers killed the Lord Holland, and took Refuge in the Earl's Palace at Lancaster, from whence repeated Orders from Court were not able to force him. The Queen and the Earl of March were not sorry, their Enemy gave them so plausible a pretence to exasperate the King against him. They represented to the young Prince, of what Importance it was, not to suffer a Subject, of what Quality soever, to take upon him to protect Criminals, and stop the Course of Justice: That it was acting the Sovereign, and there was danger, that those who assumed such a Power, intended to enlarge it at the Expence of the Royal Authority, and were contriving to disturb the Peace of the Kingdom. By these provoking Discourses, they persuaded the young King to resolve to chastise this Disobedience.

When the Earl of Lancaster knew they designed to attack him, he prepared for his Defence, and formed an Association, which was entered into by Edmund Earl of Kent, and Thomas Earl of Norfolk the King's Uncles, the Lord Beaumont (9), Judge Trussell, and some other Lords, who unanimously resolved to stand upon their Defence, in case they were attacked. At the same time they published a Manifesto, containing the Motives of their Armament, all drawn from the publick Good and Grievances of the Kingdom. They said, they had taken Arms, I. To oblige the Queen-Mother to refund into the publick Treasury, the Revenues she had caused to be assigned her, far exceeding the usual Dowry of the Queens. II. To put a stop to the Exactions and Incroachments of those who governed in the King's Name. III. To bring to condign Punishment the Betrayers of their Country, in the late War with Scotland. IV. To make Inquiry, by what means the Ordinance of Parliament establishing twelve Barons to govern the State, during the King's Minority, was not executed. V. To cause strict Inquisition to be made concerning the Death of Edward the King's Father, after he was, by private Orders, taken out of the Custody of those, to whom he was committed by the Parliament. VI. To bring those to an Account who had seized the Treasures of the late King. VII. To cause the Publick to be informed by whose Advice, the King, during his Minority, had renounced all his Pretensions to Scotland, and given up all the Charters and Instruments thereof. VIII. Lastly, To call those to an Account, who advised the King to marry the Princess his Sister to David Bruce, mortal Enemy to the English Nation.

These Articles, Copies whereof were carefully dispersed all over the Kingdom, sensibly touched the Queen and the Earl of March, who were very plainly designed. But instead of vindicating their Conduct, which indeed could not be easily done, they took another Course, and intimated to the King, that they who had taken Arms, fought to wrest the Crown from him.

They maliciously insinuated, that his two Uncles, and Henry of Lancaster Grandson of Henry III, had formed the Project of abolishing the Issue of Edward II from the Throne, of which that Prince was declared unworthy; as if the Follies of the Father were to reflect on the Children. The young King who had no suspicion of the Queen's Mother, giving Ear to this Accusation, resolved by Force of Arms to bring Persons to their Duty, whom he now considered as Rebels. He even began his Preparations, to execute this Design. In all Likelihood, this Affair would have been attended with fatal Consequences, if the Archbishop of Canterbury (1) had not zealously interposed, to stop the course of these Commotions. The Archbishop artfully hinted to the Queen, that the Manifesto of the Male contents was so plausible, and such the Grievances complained of, that it was to be feared the whole Nation would join with them. The Queen readily apprehending the Archbishop's Hints, and believing the Attempt to reduce them by force, would be as dangerous for her, as the Male-contents; she was prevailed with to end the Affair by an Agreement, to which the Male-contents were not very averse. As their Party was not yet strong enough to carry things to the Point they desired, their Intent in publishing the Manifesto, was only to convince the Queen of her great danger, in endeavouring to crush them. So, without insulting any further on their Grievances, they accepted the Pardon procured them by the Archbishop, for certain Fines, and the Banishment of Beaumont, Trussell, and the Murderer of the Lord Holland, who were excepted in the Pardon (2). On this occasion the Earl of March pretended to be a Friend to the Princes, but harboured in his Breast a lively Resentment against them, to which the Earl of Kent fell a Sacrifice (3).

Robert, the brave King of Scotland, enjoyed not long his late glorious Peace with England. He died (4) sedate and easy, with the Comfort of having freed Scotland from the Dominion of the English, and of seeing his own Family settled in the Throne. The Scots very justly rank him among their most illustrious Kings, as the Restorer of their Monarchy. This Prince, on his Death-bed, recommended three things especially, to the Persons he had appointed Regents, during the Minority of his Son David, then but eight Years old. The first, never to hazard a Battle in the Kingdom. The second, to make no long Truces with the English, in case the two Nations should come to a Rupture. The third, to have always an Eye upon what passed in England, for fear of being surprized unprepared.

The Earl of March, still supported by the Queen-Mother, saw himself raised so high, that he acted more like a Sovereign than Minister. He disposed of all the Offices, as well as of the publick Revenues, with an Authority, joined to an Arrogance very common to Favorites, and which contributes no less than their Advancement to render them odious. The extraordinary Credit of this Earl raised the jealousy of the English, who were the more, since the deposing of Edward II; and who had no greater Esteem for this new Favorite, than they had formerly for Gaveston and Spencer. Among those who discovered their Sentiments the most freely, Edmund Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle, was the principal. This Prince, as well as Edward II his Brother, had no great Genius for publick Affairs, but was naturally sincere and generous. He had, however, suffered himself to be deceived by the Artifices of Isabella, when he joined with her against his own Brother, never imagining she would have carried things so far. When once he was engaged in that Party, the suddenness of the Revolution which happened immediately after, would not permit him to recede. The Government was changed before he had time to reflect on the Consequences of the Queen's Undertaking. The disorderly Behaviour of that Princess, the Arrogance of the Favorite, the sudden Death of the King, and the ill Management of the publick Affairs, at length opened his Eyes. He perceived with Grief the Injustice of the Plot he had unhappily engaged in. A generous Man cannot, without pain, conceal his Sentiments. The Earl, little versed in Politics, was not careful enough to hide his Uneasiness at past Transactions, and at what he saw every Day. He had joined with Henry of Lancaster during the late Commotions, thereby shewing, it was not his Fault that the present Scene of Affairs was not altered. This was sufficient to induce Isabella and the Earl of March to hasten his Ruin, for fear of being themselves prevented. To that end, they laid for him the most extraordinary Snare imaginable, in which it is amazing he should suffer himself to be taken. As his Conduct was unblamable, it was necessary, in order to destroy him, so to manage it, that he should render himself criminal, that his Ruin might be thought the less strange. For that purpose, his two Adventures, by some who feigned to be his Friends, insinuated to him, that Edward II, his Brother, was still alive, and reported to be dead, only to prevent the Troubles his Friends might excite: That he was strictly guarded in Corfe Castle, and suffered to be seen by none but his Domesticks, who were confined with him. This pretended Secret was supported with divers Circumstances, and confirmed by the Testimony of several Persons of Distinction; among whom were two Bishops, who were deceived as well as Edmund, or helped to deceive him. He had himself assisted at the Funeral of the King his Brother. But what he had now heard, joined to a like Report, spread at Court by the Artifices of his Enemies, and to his Desire that the thing might be true, easily induced him to believe, he might possibly have been deceived by counterfeit Obsequies. In this belief, he resolved to try all ways to free the pretended Prisoner from his Captivity. He was however in suspense on account of his Oath to the King his Nephew; but was quickly eased of that Scruple. It is said, that being commissioned to go to the Pope, and demand the Canonization of the late Earl of Leicester, he took that opportunity to consult John XXII upon this Affair. It is added, but how truly I know not, that the Pope not only approved of his Project, but charged him to put it in execution, under pain of Excommunication. When Edmund found himself supported by such an Authority, all his Scruples vanished. So, without further Consideration, he departed from Avignon, bent upon using all his Endeavours to free the King his Brother, whom he imagined to be still in Prison. However, as this Belief was grounded only upon Report, the Certainty whereof was not well ascertained, he sent a trusty Friar to Corfe, to be assured of the Truth. The Contrivers of the Plot had taken care to have it whispered about in the Country, that Edward was still a Prisoner. So, the Monk upon his coming into those parts for private Information, found the Inhabitants of the Neighbourhood believed it. Prepossessed by these false Rumours, the Friar, pretending Business with the Governor of Corfe, asked him, whether there was really any Foundation for what was reported of Edward? The Governor, who had received his Instructions, returned such an Answer, as confirmed him in his Opinion. It is even said, that he shewed him, at a little distance, a Person sitting at a Table, who was served with great Respect; and by that means entirely convinced him, that he was not deceived. Edmund being confirmed in his Belief by the Friar's Report, came himself to Corfe, and without shewing the least doubt, demanded to be conducted to his Brother's Apartment. The treacherous Governor pretending to be surprized at his knowing the Secret, did not deny that Edward was in the Castle; but told him, he had positive Orders to let no Person see him. This Confession made Edmund repeat his Instances, but finding the Governor inflexible, he gave him a Letter for the Prisoner, wherein he assured him, he would do his utmost to procure his Liberty. This Letter was immediately carried to the Queen, who shewed it to the King her Son, magnifying his Danger from his Uncle's Practices. It was not difficult for her to obtain the King's Leave to secure the Prince's Person. He was very far from suspecting his Mother to be herself the Author of this Plot. As soon as the King had given his Consent to what was proposed, Measures were taken to apprehend Edmund at Winchester, where the Parliament was assembled. His Impeachment being brought before the Peers, his own Letter was produced, which he could not disown: Nay, he confessed that several Lords, and particularly the Archbishop of York, and Bishop of Lisieux, were concerned in the Plot, or at least had advised him to hasten the Execution (5). Upon this Confession, which shewed a settled Design to change the Government,

Also, that Sir Ingram Barette brought him a Message from William Lord Zouche, desiring he would assist in his Restoration. Likewise, that Sir Robert Trivet sent him from the Archbishop of York, to encourage him, by assuring him that he had in readiness a large number of men to carry on the War. And that Sir Eustace de March told him, that he would be the greatest support that ever could be given to him, in case he appeared at the Attempt; promising.

1349. vernment, he was condemned to lose his Head (1). The Execution soon followed the Sentence. All that Day the King was to be set by the Queen his Mother, and the Earl of March, that none could approach him to sue for the Pardon of a Prince so nearly related to him. It is even affirmed, that he knew nothing of the Sentence passed upon his Uncle, or of his Execution till it was too late. Be this as it will, Edmund was brought upon the Scaffold, to suffer the Punishment to which he was condemned. But the Executioner stealing away, he stayed from Noon till Evening, before any could be found to perform his Office. At last, towards Night, one out of the Marshalls, fevered his Head from his Body (2). This died that Prince, in the 28th Year of his Age (3). He left two Sons, who died young; and two Daughters, the youngest of whom was the greatest Beauty of her time. Her second Husband was the famous Prince of Wales, her Cousin, eldest Son of Edward III. Edmund was the only Person prosecuted for the imaginary Crime for which he suffered Death; tho' according to his Depositions, several others ought to have undergone the same Punishment. But the Authors of the Plot wanted no other Sacrifice. Besides, they took care not to examine Matters too strictly, for fear of giving occasion to discover, what it was their Interest to conceal. It is even very probable, that several of those impeached by Edmund, were Betrayers, employed by his Enemies to hurry him into Destruction.

Before I proceed, it will be necessary to speak of Edward's Affairs with France during his Minority. Not only the Order of time requires it, but it is very proper to clear beforehand, the Origin of an Affair which is to be the principal Subject of this Prince's Majority. To that end, I must resume the Account of the Disputes between the two Crowns, where I left off in the Reign of Edward II.

The last Treaty made at Paris, by the Mediation of Isabella, did not fully end all the Differences between Edward II. and Charles the Fair. The Queen, who had only in View the Project formed against the King her Husband, did not think it her Interest to discuss all the Articles included in these Disputes. She was too apprehensive of raising some Obstacle to her principal Design. On the other hand, King Charles, who was in possession of Agenois, did not think proper to urge, himself, any farther Discussion of Matters. So the Sentence passed at Paris, in the Business of St. Sardis, which condemned the Gascen Lords to Banishment, and decreed the demolishing of their Castles, was still in force: But the Treaty concluded by the Queen, preserved Edward's Pretensions entire, and left him free to prosecute his Right in the Court of Peers. The Renunciation of Guienne, occasioned fresh Difficulties. Edward II. pretended, that Charles in receiving the Homage of the Prince his Nephew, obliged himself to restore that whole Province; which the King of France denied.

Edward III., was no sooner on the Throne, but by Advice of his Parliament, he sent (4) Ambassadors to France, to make an agreement between the two Crowns. Shortly after a new Treaty was concluded (5), containing these six Articles.

I. That both sides should restore whatever was conquered during the War.

II. That Edward should pay the King of France fifty thousand Marks Sterling, to satisfy him for his Charges on occasion of the Rupture.

III. That a general Pardon should be granted by both Parties.

IV. That the King of France should pardon the Feudal of the Gascen Lords, as to Life and Limbs, on condition they submitted to Banishment.

V. That Edward should undertake to demolish their Castles.

VI. That this Treaty should be of no Effect, unless ratified by the King of England before Easter (6).

The Court of England was too desirous of Peace, to neglect the Performance of the last Article. So there was a good Intelligence between the two Crowns, during the rest of that Year; both Kings taking care to avoid all Occasions of a fresh Rupture.

Hardly was this Affair ended, when a new and more important occasion of quarrel engaged the two Kingdoms in a War, which caused Torrents of Blood to be spilt, and brought France in the end to the very Brink of Destruction. Charles the Fair dying on the first of February 1328. without Male-Issue, and leaving Joanna his Queen big with Child, there arose a great Dispute concerning the Regency of the Kingdom, during the Queen's Pregnancy. Edward (7) laid claim to it, as Nephew and nearest Relation of the deceased King. But Philip Son of Charles de Valois, and Cousin-German of the same King, maintained, he had an incontestable Right to the Regency. He founded his Claim upon the Salick-Law, which, in his Opinion, debarred the Females and their Descendants from the Succession to the Crown; whence he inferred that neither had they any right to the Regency, in prejudice of the Male-Line. This Controversy was decided in Favor of Philip by the Peers of France, who adjudged him the Regency till the Queen was delivered. It was partly on this occasion that Edward called the Parliament at Northampton, on account, as was said, of the Peace with Scotland. He laid before them his Reasons for claiming the Regency of France; the Injury he pretended was done him in the Preference of Philip de Valois; and the disadvantageous Inference that might be drawn from his Exclusion, with respect to the Crown of France, in case the Child, the Queen was big with, should not live, or be a Daughter. Historians do not positively say, what the Parliament's Opinion was in this so nice an Affair. But as the Members were at the Devotion of the Queen-Mother and the Earl of March, very probably they were no more scrupulous with respect to the Affairs of France, than they had been concerning those of Scotland. There were much more plausible Reasons to dissuade Edward from making War with France. The Difficulty of the Undertaking, the Strength of the Kingdom; the King's Age, were Objections not easily to be answered. Besides, it might so happen, that the Preparations to support the King's Claim, would be fruitless, if the Queen-Widow should be delivered of a Son. In spite of these Reasons, it was not possible to persuade the young King, to relinquish a Right which he thought very justly belonged to him. However, as he was still a Minor, he perceived, it would be very difficult effectually to oppose the Advice of the Queen his Mother, his Council, and the Parliament. But if he tacitly desisted from his Pretensions to a Regency which was about to expire, it was otherwise with regard to the Crown it self, in case the Point in Question was not decided by the Birth of a Prince. This appears in several of his Letters to certain Lords of Guienne, dated the 28th of March, about a Month before Queen Joanna's Delivery. On supposition she was brought to bed of a Daughter, he told these Lords, his Intent was to use all possible means to recover the Right and Inheritance of the Queen his Mother.

In April, Joanna was delivered of a Princess, whose Birth would from that Moment have occasioned a bloody War, if Edward had been in Condition to prosecute his Pretensions. He demanded however the Crown of France from his Ambassadors: (8) But Philip causing himself to be crowned, by Virtue of the Judgment that gave him the Regency, the English Ambassadors were not so much concerned as heard. I slightly pass over these things, because it will be necessary to speak of them more largely hereafter. It suffices at present to know, that Edward not having it in his Power to push this Affair, thought proper to let it lie dormant till a more favorable Opportunity. Several Pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts shew, this was his Intention, and that his Silence argued nothing less than a Design to depart from his Right. We see there, that immediately after the Coronation of Philip de Valois, he 1349. making his best Assistance. More yet, that Sir Isopem Barrege came to him again from Sir John Pale, letting him know he should have his Help, and that the Barons of Guienne, and Sir Thomas Ragnier at Paris solicited him thereon, saying, they were ready to come into England to his Aid. And, that the said Sir Isopem came to him another time at Arundel, into his Bed-Chamber, and assured him of the Boldness of London, &c. &c. &c. &c.

1120. began to take Measures in order to war against him. His Alliance about this time with the Duke of Brabant, and several Lords who engaged to supply him with Troops, is a clear Evidence he was meditating some grand Design, and his Letters to the Lords of Guienne shew it was against France. In these Letters dated September 14, 1128, he positively said, his Intent was to recover his Mother's Inheritance. Now at that time, he had no Quarrel with France, wherein the Queen his Mother was particularly concerned. The Inheritance he mentions, concerned therefore the whole Kingdom of France, since his Contests with Philip about Guienne had no Relation to Isabella's Right.

Philip de Valois being engaged, in the beginning of his Reign, in a War with the Flamings, was in no haste to demand Edward's Homage for Guienne and Ponthieu. It was not till April 1129, that he caused him to be summoned to (1) appear and do Homage in Person (2). In Edward's present Disposition, he would have gladly been excused from paying Homage to a Prince, whom he considered as an Usurper of his Right. But his Council reflecting on his Youth, and the State of the Kingdom full of Male-content, could not think of approving a Refusal which probably would throw him into great difficulties. On the other hand, the Queen his Mother and the Earl of Marche, did all that lay in their Power to prevent a Quarrel with Philip. They represented to him, that he would infallibly lose all his Dominions in France, if he unadvisedly discovered his Pretensions to that Kingdom, before he was ready to support them. But these Remonstrances would perhaps have had little Weight with him, if for his satisfaction there had not been devised an Expedient, becoming indeed the Sincerity Kings ought to profess, but which his Youth and Passion permitted him not to examine too nicely. It was suggested to him, that by protesting beforehand against the Homage, it would be no Detriment to his Claim. Pursuant to this Advice, he made by a Procurator, the following Protestation before his Council: "That for any Homage whatever to be made to the Lord Philip de Valois (now bearing himself a King of France) by King Edward of England, for the Dukedom of Guienne, and Earldom of Ponthieu, he did not thereby intend to renounce his Hereditary Right to the Realm of France, or any ways derogate from the same; even tho' Letters thereupon should be signed with either of his Seals. And he did farther protest, that he would not do any Homage to the Lord Philip, of his own free will, but only for the just fear he had of losing the said Duchy and Earldom, and because he was afraid that he could not avoid other great Dangers and irreparable Losses." (3) This Declaration was signed by the King and Council, but was not communicated to Philip's Envoy. He only receiv'd this general Answer, that the King would perform as soon as possible what he owed the Crown of France.

How great soever Edward's Unwillingness was to do this Homage, the Consequences whereof he so much dreaded, he resolved upon it, for fear of making known by his Refusal, a Design which it was not yet proper to discover. To make himself Amends, in some measure, for the mortifying Step he was forced to, he ordered a great Number of Lords to attend him, and with a very splendid Equipage, and a Retinue of a thousand Horse, came to Amiens, where Philip expected him. On the Day appointed for doing his Homage (4), he appeared before the King of France, in a Robe of Crimson-Velvet, embroidered with Leopards of Gold, his Crown on his head, his Sword by his side, and gold Spurs on his heels. The King of France received him sitting on his Throne, his Crown on his head, his Sceptre in his hand, and a Robe of blue Velvet, powdered of Flower-de-Luces of Gold. By him were the Kings of Navarre and Castile (5), all the Peers and principal Lords of France, whom he had expressly sent for, to be Witnesses of the said Homage. Before Edward's Arrival, Philip protested this should be a huge Homage (6), as indeed it ought to have been. But in the Conferences held on this account, before the Ceremony, Matters were otherwise settled. Edward protesting he was not perfectly informed of the manner of the Homage, offered to do it in general Terms. However, he promised upon his Honour, that if, upon consulting his Records, he found the Homage to be full, he would give Letters-Parents of it, under his Great Seal. Upon that Condition, Philip consented to receive the Homage in general Terms. This was really the manner wherein Edward did it, whatever some French Historians may have said to the contrary, who, doubtless, were misled by bad Memoirs. Edward's Historians have likewise upon no better Grounds, that the King of France was not going to order him to be seized, but that the Bishop of Lincoln gave his Master notice of it, who withdrew without taking Leave. This cannot be true, since Philip could not have taken this Resolution, but upon Edward's refusing to do full Homage, and yet it is certain he was very willing to receive it in general Terms: Nay, they had several Conferences together, after the Ceremony. Before they parted, it was agreed, that Edward should send Ambassadors to France, to finish what the late Treaty had left undecided (7).

As Edward stood disposed, with regard to the King of France, he was not very forward to send the promised Declaration. On the contrary, he tried to gain Time, by Proposals of a double Marriage of his Brother and Sister with the Son and Daughter of Philip. He even kept at London almost a Year, on divers Pretences, Ambassadors sent to press him to perform his Promise. During that time, Edward was very urgent in his suit with the King of France, to end their Differences about Guienne, as was agreed at their late Interview. It was easy to see Edward sought only to delay. Accordingly Philip, who impatiently bore all these Delays sent him word (8), that he would not be his Dupe. He dispatched into Guienne the Earl of Alexander his Brother (9), who took and demolished the Castle of Xaintes, and plundered that Town. These Hostilities, which Edward did not expect, produced a new Treaty between the two Monarchs (10). Edward positively promised to send the Declaration of Homage, to pay the fifty thousand Marks Sterling owing to France, and sixty thousand Parisian Livres for the Attainment, made him by the King his Father, of Guienne. Moreover he promised to see the Castles demolished, belonging to the Gafcon Lords condemned in the Reign of Charles the Fair. Shortly after the Conclusion of this Treaty (11), he sent the King of France Letters-Parents under his Great Seal, to confirm and specify the Homage he had done at Amiens. He expressly declared the Homage was to be deemed full; and that the Homages which he himself or Successors Dukes of Guienne and Earls of Ponthieu, performed hereafter, should be done in the same manner, and with the same Formalities, as the King of France had expected. In these Letters there was a Pattern how the Homage was to be performed. After he had sent this authentick Declaration, he took a Journey to Boulogne, under colour of performing a Vow (12). He saw Philip, and obtained of him an Abatement of thirty thousand Livres Tournois, for the Damage done to the Town and Castle of Xaintes, and an absolute Pardon for the condemned Gafcon Lords. Let us leave a moment Edward's Affairs with France, to see what passed in England during these Negotiations. We shall soon have occasion to resume the Sequel of these Affairs, which are the principal Subject of this Reign.

(1) P. David says, he caused King Edward to be summoned to do so; first, by Peter Roger, Abbot of Tewkesbury, who was afterwards Pope, by the name of Clement VI. but he had no Audience from the King, only from the Queen Mother, with whom nothing could be agreed on. So that, after the Earl of Marche, Philip de Valois seized the Revenues of Guienne and Ponthieu. Soon after that, he sent four other Ambassadors to renew the Summons. Thus, King Edward received very civilly, and promised to come over to France in a short time. Which he accordingly did, about six or seven Months after. Vol. IV. c. 22. p. 128.

It was soon after his Return from Amiens, that Edward began, as 'tis suppos'd, to be suspicious of the Queen his Mother's Conduct (1). When it was perceived at Court, that the King grew weary of being under the Guardianship of his Mother and the Favorite, their Enemies failed not to do all that lay in their Power, to make him jealous of them. So many things deserving his Attention were insinuated to him, that he resolv'd at length to have perfect Information of his Affairs. Those to whom he applied, caus'd him to observe, "That the Earl of Marche affected to out-hiss his Sovereign, by a Magnificence so splendid as to a Subject: That he dispos'd of all the Offices of the Kingdom to his Creatures: That he was absolute Master of the Fortune of the English, casting down some, and raising others, according as they appear'd for or against his Interest: That by his private Orders Edward II, was murdered: That the Earl of Kent lost his Life by his secret Practices: Finally, That very probably the Queen and her Minister had form'd the Design, of securing the Royal Authority, by keeping him always a Minor." Some add, that it was intimated to him, that the Queen his Mother was big with Child by Mortimer. What they say is not unlikely, since, according to the Testimony of Freiffart, the Report of her being with Child was spread over the whole Kingdom. These Informations entirely convinced the King, of what he had hitherto only suspected. He call'd to mind the sudden death of the King his Father; the Beheading of the Earl of Kent his Uncle; the dishonourable Peace he was made to conclude with Scotland; the extravagant Dowry of the Queen his Mother; the Credit, Riches, and Pride of the Earl of Marche, and abhorring the Wickedness of those who made the Publick Good a pretence to gratify their Passions, he resolv'd to punish them. However, he carefully conceal'd his purpose, till an Opportunity offer'd of acting, without danger of ruining himself. To execute his Design, he chose the time the Parliament was to meet at Nottingham (2). The Court being come to that Town, Queen Isabella and the Earl of Marche lodg'd in the Castle, with a Guard of one hundred and eighty Knights (3), whilst the King, with a small Retinue, was lodg'd in the Town. In spite of these Precautions, which seem'd to shew that the Queen and the Favorite were not without their Uneasiness, Edward, having gain'd the Governor (4), enter'd the Castle through a subterraneous Passage, and came into his Mother's Apartment, accompanied with Montacute, and some other Officers, all bent to lose their Lives in his Service. There was at first some Noise made, and two Knights of the Guard were killed, who having less respect for the King than their Companions, offer'd to resist. The Earl of Marche was apprehended, and notwithstanding the Queen's Cries, and Intreaties to spare the gallant Mortimer (5), he was carried out the same way the King came in, and conducted under a strong Guard to the Tower of London (6).

This Master-piece of Policy succeeding so well, the King dissolv'd the Parliament, and summon'd another (7). As the late Parliament had not regard'd so much the Publick Good, as the Interests of the Queen and the Earl of Marche, the King bitterly complain'd, in his Summons, of the Members, and took occasion to exhort the People, to chuse Representatives who had the Good of the State more at heart. The Parliament met at London, with Dispositions very different from those of the former. Most of the Members, overjoyed to see the Kingdom freed from the Tyranny of the Earl of Marche, aimed only at the Reformation of what was amiss in the Government, and the Punishment of the Favorite, according to his Crimes; the common Fate of Favourites and Ministers who abuse their Power. How greatsoever they may be, they must expect to see themselves abandoned by all, whenever their Affairs begin to decline.

In his Speech to the Parliament, the King complain'd in general of the Queen and Mortimer. After which, he said, that, with the Consent of his Subjects, he design'd to assume himself the Reins of the Government, tho' he was not yet arriv'd at the Age prescribed by the Law. The Parliament gladly consented; all the Members being equally ready to second his Designs (8).

Edward being thus freed from his Governors, his first care was to seize the exorbitant Dower of the Queen his Mother, and reduce it to a Pension of three thousand Pounds a Year (9). At the same time she was confin'd to her House at Rifings (10), left by her Intrigues she should excite new Troubles. Mezari was mistaken, when he said, that Edward hasten'd his Mother's Death. It is certain, she lived twenty-eight Years in her Confinement, where the King her Son visit'd her once or twice every Year, more out of Decency than Affection.

As for the Earl of Marche, he was treated with the utmost Rigour. His Impeachment, brought before the Parliament, contain'd divers Articles, of which these were the principal: That he had seiz'd the Government of the Kingdom without Authority, and contrary to the express Regulation of the Parliament: That he had plac'd, about the King, Spies upon all his Actions, that he might not be able to free himself from the Subjection he was kept under: That he had procur'd the Death of Edward II by his express Orders: That he had contriv'd a treacherous Plot to take away the Life of the late Earl of Kent, the King's Uncle: That he had appropriat'd to his own use, the twenty thousand Marks paid by the King of Scotland: Lastly, That he had liv'd in a too familiar manner with the Queen-Mother. For all these Crimes, which were affirm'd to be notorious, and for proof whereof, no Evidences were so much as heard, he was condemn'd to die (11). His Sentence, which ran, that he should, as a Traitor, be drawn and hang'd on the common Gallows at Tyburn (12), was executed without the least favor. There was this remarkable in his Sentence, that he was condemn'd without being heard, as he himself had serv'd the Spencers. But this irregularity prov'd advantageous to his Family. For Roger his Grandson obtain'd afterwards an Act to reverse this Sentence, as erroneous. We shall see, in the Sequel of this History, his Descendants by the Female-Line mount the Throne of England. The Article of his Impeachment concerning Freiffart, his Commerce with the Queen, is a clear Evidence, how much the whole Kingdom was offend'd at their Familiarity. If it had not been notorious, there is no likelihood that the Parliament would have wound'd that Prince's Honour so deeply, which could not but reflect on the King her Son. They who have endeavour'd to vindicate her, by the little probability, that a Princess of so high a Rank should so far forget herself, did not consider that a few Years before, the three Daughters-in-law of Philip the Fair were as regardless of their Reputation, by the Confection of all the Historians (13).

Thus Edward began betimes to wipe out the Blemishes which had sullied his Minority, and in taking upon him the Government, gave happy Prefages of the Glory and Prosperity of his Reign. For a farther Addition to the publick Happiness, Heaven blest the young Monarch with a Son, whom the Queen brought this Year into the World (14). He was call'd Edward after his Father, 1331. and became in his Time the most illustrious and most accomplished Prince, England had ever produced (1).

After Edward had taken upon him the Administration of Affairs, France were impatient to see, which way the young Prince would turn. His Courage, his Abilities, and his active Spirit, made them believe he would not, like the King his Father, chuse an indolent Life. It was much more likely he would imitate his Grandfather Edward I. France and Scotland were equally concerned to observe his first Proceedings. France might be apprehensive, he would renew his Pretensions to the Crown, obtained by Philip de Valois to his Prejudice. Scotland had no less reason to fear, he would break through the dishonourable Treaty, wherein he was engaged by the Queen his Mother and Mortimer, during his Non-age. Though the King of Scotland was his Brother-in-law, it was known in those Days, as well as at present, that the Bond of Affinity is not always a sufficient Bar to the Ambition of Princes. And indeed, Edward had in view these two grand Designs. But it was not possible for him to engage at once in two so considerable Undertakings. He resolved therefore to begin with Scotland, that he might, after subduing that Kingdom, attack France with the united Forces of the two Nations which divided Great Britain.

The Peace concluded two Years before with Robert Bruce, seemed to lay an insuperable Obstacle in his way. But ambitious Princes always find Pretences enough to gratify their Passions. Edward had one, which to him appeared just, or at least sufficient to authorize his Attempt upon Scotland; namely, that he was betrayed by his Mother and Ministers in the late Treaty with Robert Bruce. But how specious soever this Reason might seem to him, he did not think proper to use it, till he was almost sure of the Success of his Enterprize. To compass his ends, he made use of the Ministry of Edward Baliol, Son of that John Baliol, placed on the Throne of Scotland by Edward I, and afterwards deposed as a Punishment for his pretended Rebellion. It was now thirty eight Years, since his Father was dethroned. After so long an Interval, the Son, who, since the Death of his Father, led an obscure Life in France, little expected to see the King of England press him to prosecute his Right to the Crown of Scotland. This however, was by Edward's Order intimated to him by the Bruce: That David's Minority afforded him a Juncture which would not easily be met with again: In fine, that the King of England was inclined to second his Endeavours. Baliol lent a ready Ear to so flattering a Proposal, and to be certain himself, how far he might rely on the King, came into England (2), where he kept himself concealed. During that time, he treated with Edward, by the Mediation of Beaumont, concerning the Terms on which he was to engage in this Enterprize. Edward's Historian labours heartily to vindicate the King, in a Proceeding so contrary to Sincerity, and the late Treaty with Scotland. But they who are not concerned to defend his Reputation, will hardly deny, that, on this occasion, Ambition was the sole or real Motive of his Conduct. It is but too probable, that the Prospect of an Acquisition, like That of the Kingdom of Scotland, made him overlook his Scruples on that account. Of this I shall hereafter give more than probable Proofs.

The two Parties came to an Agreement without much Difficulty. Baliol thought he could not purchase too dearly a Crown, to which he would never have dared to aspire, without being assured of a powerful Assistance. On the other hand, Edward, who minded his own, more than the Concerns of Baliol, and intended to reap all the Benefit of this Enterprize, scrupled not to promise still more than Baliol durst have expected. The Articles of their Agreement were no sooner settled, but the English Nobles were privately told, that in serving Baliol they would please the King. This was sufficient to engage in his Party those, who, having received Lands in Scotland by the Bounty of Edward I, had afterwards lost them by the Revolutions in that Kingdom. Besides this Aid, Baliol could also depend, in Scotland itself, upon the assistance of the old Friends of his Family, who found it their Interest to support him. And indeed, the placing this Prince on the Throne, was the only way to recover the Offices and Posts they were removed from, 1331. after Robert Bruce's Advancement.

Whilst Baliol was making his Preparations, Edward pretended punctually to observe the Peace with Scotland, and issued upon that account several Orders, which were not well executed. He even published a Proclamation against such as were engaged in the Service of Baliol. But this Step was taken when they were just going, and it was too late to prevent them. His sole Aim was, to make the Publick believe, he was not concerned in an Undertaking, of which indeed he was the real Author.

As soon as Baliol was ready, he embarked his little Army, consisting but of two thousand five hundred Men, and landed at Kinghorn near Perth (3), from whence he sent back his Ships. He was willing by that to shew his Troops, they had nothing to trust to but their Valour. Mean while, his Preparations could not be so privately made, but the Scots had Intelligence thereof. Hardly were his Men landed, when he heard, that Alexander Seaton was coming to give him Battle, at the Head of ten thousand Men. All means of retreat being taken from the English, they had no hopes of Safety but in Victory. Accordingly, expecting their Enemies with a noble Resolution, they fought with such uncommon Bravery, that the Scotch General, with an Army much superior, was shamefully and entirely routed (4). The Earl of Fife, who followed Seaton with a still more numerous Army, willing to revenge this disgrace, had no better success. After these two Victories, Baliol advancing farther into the Country, met with another Body of Scotch Troops, whom he likewise defeated. Five Days after, he fought Nigel Bruce, who came to attack him with ten thousand Men. In this last Action he gave no Quarter, because he would not be incumbered with Prisoners.

Four Battles lost in so short a Space, throwing the Scots into the uttermost Consternation, Baliol had time to besiege Perth, called also St. John's Town, of which he easily became Master. He found there a great Quantity of warlike Stores and Provisions, which he wanted extremely, in order to make farther Progress. His Affairs obliging him to remove from Perth, Patrick Dumbair, Earl of Marche, took advantage of his Absence, and besieged the same Town. But upon the first News of Baliol's marching to relieve it, he hastily raised the Siege, though his Army was superior in Number. Such Terror had their former Losses struck into the Scots.

Baliol's good Fortune failed not to produce the usual Effects. Great Numbers of Lords and Gentlemen of the Country came and swore Fealty to him. This Defection, which threatened King David with a greater, obliged the young Prince to fly with his Queen into France, it being unsafe to remain any longer in their Kingdom. Mean time, to influence the Affairs of Scotland, Edward so managed it, that several private Persons fitted out a Fleet in their own Name, to give Chace to that which the Scots had sent to Sea, and which was their last Refuge. The Loss of this Fleet, which was destroyed by the English, quite confounded David's Adherents. The Earl of Fife, who was one of the principal, submitted to the Conqueror, and his Example was followed by many others. These good Successes determined Baliol to cause himself to be crowned. The Ceremony was performed at Stone, the usual Place of the Inauguration of the Kings (5).

The new King was no sooner on the Throne, but in order to perform his Treaty with the King of England, he did him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland in the same manner as his Father had done it to Edward I, that is, with all the Circumstances denoting an entire Subjection. In his Letters-Patent, he said expressly, that it was with the Consent of the King of England, and the Assistance of the English, that he recovered the Possession of his Inheritance, of which he supposed, contrary to Truth, that John his Father was deprived by Robert Bruce. Moreover, he resigned to the King of England, in payment of the Supplies received from him, the Town and Castle of Berwick, which were still in the Hands of King David. He offered likewise to marry Jeanna, Sister of Edward, if that Prince's Marriage with David Bruce could be annulled. Lastly, he promised to furnish the King his Sovereign with Aids of Men and Money, whenever required 1332. All these Circumstances plainly shew, Edward was but too far concerned in this Expedition, how much soever his Historians may labour to clear him (1).

Whilst Baliol was employed in pushing his Conquests in Scotland, Edward called a Parliament to demand a Subsidy (2). His Pretence was, certain Troubles in Ireland, which he represented as so dangerous, that there was a necessity of sending an Army thither (3). The Subsidy was readily granted. But whilst the Troops designed for this Expedition were marching to embark, they received Orders to advance towards the Borders of Scotland. Edward representing to the Parliament, that it was dangerous to leave the northern Counties defenceless, whilst their Neighbours were in Arms; and affirming, his Presence was necessary in those Parts, it was resolved, that the Irish Expedition should be deferred to some other time. Probably, the Parliament did not suffer themselves to be deceived, but were willing to shut their Eyes voluntarily, not to obstruct the King's Designs.

1333. Mean time, Edward finding, that by the Rapidity of Baliol's Conquests, his Project succeeded to his Wish, immediately pulled off the Mask. He began, upon frivolous Pretences to complain, that the Scots had violated the Treaty of Peace. He must needs have been in great want of good Reasons, since he used one so very ungrateful, in the then Circumstances of Scotland. The Regent left by King David in Scotland, spared neither Excuses, nor Intreaties, nor Submissions to divert the impending Storm, but all to no purpose. Edward, who had formed the Design of taking Berwick, soon after besieged that Place. He pressed it so briskly, that he obliged the Governor (4) to sign a Capitulation (5), promising to surrender the Town, unless relieved by such a Day. During that time, the Regent, seeing Berwick could not be saved without exerting his utmost, levied an Army, and was advancing with all speed to give the English Battle. Edward, who was informed of it, expected him at Halydon-Hill, where was fought a bloody Battle, which ended in the entire Rout of the Army of Scotland. Seven Scotch Earls were slain on the Spot; with nine hundred Knights, and four thousand Gentlemen, besides thirty-two thousand common Soldiers, if we believe the English Historians. But the Scots own but ten thousand, which doubtless is nearest the Truth. This Victory was followed by the surrender of Berwick, which the King annexed for ever to the Crown of England.

The success of this Campaign answering Edward's Expectation, he returned into his own Dominions, leaving with Baliol a Body of Troops to complete the Reduction of all Scotland. Strengthened with this Aid, Baliol took several Towns, after which he held his first Parliament at Edinburgh (6). He caused whatever had been done in favor of the King of England, to be confirmed and ratified. Moreover, all the English Lords who had served Baliol, recovered the Lands they had lost in Scotland, or acquired others. All the Acts of Parliament passed in the Reign of Robert Bruce were annulled, as wanting a lawful Authority. Baliol was not satisfied with shewing his Gratitude to Edward, by the Cession of Berwick, and doing him Homage, but resigned to him likewise Roxburgh, Fedburgh, Selkirk, Dumfries, and the Castle of Edinburgh, in reward, as he said himself in his Letters, for the Assistance received from him to recover his Dominions (7).

This voluntary Homage, and these extraordinary Alienations, made him forfeit the Esteem and Affection of his new Subjects. It was easy for them to see, that Baliol was but Edward's Instrument, to render himself Master of Scotland. In this belief, they resolved to shake off the Yoke of their new King, who so visibly betrayed the Interests of the Nation. Some of the great Men (8), improving this general Disposition, headed a Body of Malecontents, and went in quest of Baliol, who expected nothing less than to be attacked. They surprised and defeated him, forcing him to fly on an Horse without a Saddle to Carlisle, from whence he sent his Protector word of the Misfortune befallen him.

About the same time Edward summoned a Parliament (9), and communicated his Design, as he said, of going to the Holy-Land with the King of France, and several other Christian Princes. But the news of the Revolution in Scotland, made him alter his pretended Project. Having obtain'd the Aid of Money he demanded, he marched towards that Kingdom, at the Head of a numerous Army, and penetrated without Opposition to the Northern Counties, whilst the Scotch Army kept in Posts, where it was not possible to attack them. So for want of Enemies to engage with, he left Scotland, and returned into England. Hardly had he reach'd the Borders, when Dunbar, who commanded the Scotch Army, falling out of his Retreats, retook some Places from the English. As the Season would not permit the King to go in quest of his Enemies, he sent his Troops into Winter-Quarters, and that he might be at hand, resolved to pass the Winter at Roxburgh.

In the Spring he attacked Scotland by Sea and Land. 1334. He even advanced as far as the Northern Ocean. But he reaped no great Advantages from this Incursion, as the North Parts of Scotland could not be kept without an Aid. Pub. Army always there, superior to that of the Scots. So, finding he could not allure them to a Battle, he staid some time at Perth, whilst the Earl of Cornwall his Brother, ravaged the Western Counties of that unfortunate Kingdom. It is true, the Scots gained some Advantage over five hundred English Archers, who suffered themselves to be surprized. They took likewise the Earl of Namur, the Prince his Brother, who served in Edward's Army. But this last Advantage proved fatal to them, as it occasioned the Loss of the Earl of Murray, Regent of the Kingdom. This Earl, who was so generous as to give his two Prisoners their Liberty, carrying his Civilities a little too far in waiting upon them himself to the Frontiers, had the Misfortune to be taken by a Party of the Garri-son of Roxburgh. This accident, added to the Losses already sustained by the Scots, that of a good General, and a very able Regent.

Mean time, the Pope and the King of France were strongly using their Interest, though indirectly, for King David, by endeavouring to turn the English Arms another way. Whilst Edward was at Perth, he received Ambassadors from France, who, jointly with the Pope's Nuncio, pressed him to perform his Engagement to carry his Arms into Palestine. He easily perceived, their sole Intent was to divert him from the War with Scotland. So, to avoid all farther Solicitations, he plainly told Philip's Ambassadors, that by God's Grace he was in a Condition to make War against the Infidels, without their Master's Aid, as soon as he had finished the Conquest of Scotland. This Answer convincing the Scots that he was fully resolved not to end the War till he was absolute Master of the Kingdom, the greatest Part voluntarily submitted; plainly perceiving, it was not possible for them to resist any longer. They who took this course obtained very favourable Terms, but there were others who chose rather to be exposed to the last Extremities, than submit to the Yoke of the English. After the Campaign was over, Edward returned in Triumph to England (10), having order'd Perth, Edinburgh, and Sterling, to be fortified, and left the Government of Scotland to the Earl of Arbuthnot.

The new General who, though a Scotchman, had joined with Edward, in order to revenge some Affronts received from his Countrymen, had no sooner the Command of the English Army, but he went and laid Siege to Kildrumny, Dunbar and Douglaf, who commanded the Scotch Forces, hastened to its Relief, and though their Army was not near so numerous, they defeated and slew the Earl of Arbuthnot, and relieved the Town. This Success reviving the Cou-

1336. Edward, who thought he had sufficiently tamed the Scots, fell into a sort of a Fury upon the News of this fresh Revolt. As soon as the Season would permit, he marched a fourth time into the Heart of Scotland (1), and ravaged in a merciless manner the Counties that had declared against him. In his return, he burnt the Town of Aberdeen, and some other places of less Note; and leaving a small Army with Balliol, marched back to his Dominions (2), where he was called by more important Affairs. This was Edward's last Expedition into Scotland. It was time for that unhappy Kingdom to enjoy some Repose. Since it was first invaded by Edward I., so much Scotch Blood had been spilt, that it is very surprising, after so many Losses, the People of that Country should still be able to contend for their Liberty (3).

Edward's four Expeditions into Scotland gained him no doubt a great Reputation. But it seems that part of his Glory might have been disputed, by the consideration of the Superiority of his Troops; more numerous, better disciplined, and more amply provided with all things necessary, than those of the Scots. He was willing therefore to demonstrate in a larger and more noble Field, that he was not afraid to face the greatest Enemies. So, from henceforth, neglecting Scotland, which he believed sufficiently subdued, and which afforded him no more Laurels; he resolved to attack France, the most powerful State of all Europe, and to use his utmost endeavours to wrest the Crown from Philip de Valois. I have already mentioned his claim to that Kingdom, from which he was excluded by Virtue of the Salic-Law. As he pretended this Law was misunderstood, and as that was the Origin and Cause of a long and bloody War, which frequently brought France into extreme Danger, there would be a sort of Necessity, before we proceeded to particulars, to shew the real Foundation of this War. But as this Matter cannot be briefly explained, I must beg the Reader's leave to refer him to the Dissertation at the End of this Reign, that the Thread of the History may not be interrupted. It suffices here to say in a Word, that Edward pretended, the Salic-Law, in excluding Females from the Succession to the Crown, did not exclude their Male-Issue; from whence he inferred, that the next Male-Heir ought to succeed.

The Collection of the Publick Acts contains several Pieces, clearly shewing, that although Edward seemed to submit to the Judgment given against him in France, he was meditating some great design, and that against France. Amongst others, there is a Letter to the Inhabitants of Bayonne, positively promising them never to make Peace with France without their being included, though he was not then in War with that Crown. It was not therefore Robert d'Artois, expelled France, and sheltered in England, that inspired him with the Thoughts of invading France, as all the Historians unanimously affirm. I do not deny however, that Robert d'Artois, displeased with Philip de Valois, helped by his Councils, and perhaps by the Consideration of his Friends in France, to make him hasten the Execution of his Project. But since Robert d'Artois, is generally reckoned the Author of this Undertaking, and of the Calamities suffered by France on that occasion, it will not be improper to inform the Reader of the Reasons which that Prince defended from Lewis VIII., thought he had to complain of Philip. For that purpose, it will be necessary to know something of the Genealogy of the House of Artois.

Robert, Earl of Artois, Son of Lewis VIII King of France, had a Son and a Daughter, namely, Robert and Maud. Robert II was Earl of Artois, and Maud married Othenin Earl of Burgundy, by whom she had two Daughters, Joanna and Blanch, who were Wives to Philip le Long, and Charles the Fair, Kings of France. Joanna had a Daughter called Blanch, married to Eudes Duke of Burgundy. Robert II had but one Son, named Philip, who dying before the Earl his Father, left Robert his Son, the third of that Name, but not Earl of Artois. Robert III claimed the Earldom, as Grandson to Robert II, and the next Male-Heir. But Maud his Great Aunt, maintained, that the Succession belonged to her, as Sister of Robert II, and nearer by one degree than Robert III. The Court of Peers decided the Affair in favour of Maud, whose two Daughters were married to the two younger Sons of Philip the Fair. Robert d'Artois submitted to the Sentence during Philip's Life, and all the Reign of Lewis Hutin; but took Arms in the Regency of Philip le Long, and got possession of Artois. When from Regent, Philip was become King, the Affair of Artois was again brought before the Court of Peers, and decided once more in favour of Maud his Mother-in-law. After the Death of Charles the Fair, Robert d'Artois was, of all the great Men of France, the Person that acted with the greatest Warmth, to procure the Crown for Philip de Valois his Brother-in-law, and maintained the most strenuously the Authority of the Salic-Law. He hoped thereby to establish a Precedent in his favour, with regard to the Earldom of Artois, and that the Salic-Law being admitted, with respect to the Crown, all the Fiefs thereof would be subject to the same Law. So, depending upon this Precedent which made for him, and the Advantage of being Brother-in-law of the new King, he revived the Process, and produced certain Charters under the Great-Seal, to confirm his Right. But Philip caused the Charters to be examined so strictly, that they were discovered to be counterfeit, for which a Gentlewoman of Artois, who had forged them, was severely punished. These Charters, on which Robert founded his Claim, being rejected, the Earldom of Artois was adjudged to Blanch, Daughter of Philip le Long, by virtue of the Right she had from Maud her Grandmother. Robert, full of Indignation, fell into a Passion with the King, and upbraided him in such a manner, as touched him very sensibly. It is said, he proceeded to Threats, which determined the King to prosecute him with the utmost Rigour. He ordered him to be summoned before the Peers; and causing him to be condemned for Non-appearance, commanded the Sentence to be publicly read in the Streets of Paris. Robert withdrew into Hainault: but Philip not letting him rest there, he took the desperate Course of throwing himself into the Arms of the King of England. He found that Monarch finishing the War with Scotland, and meditating his Enterprise upon France. In all likelihood, he contributed by his Solicitations to hasten the Execution of that Project (4).

So important a War could not be undertaken, without extraordinary Preparations, and the support of divers Alliances, which might balance the Superiority France had then over England. Edward had now gained the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Gelder and Hainault, his Brothers-in-law, the Archbishop of Cologne, and several other German Princes: Nay, he neglected not the private Affluences of divers Lords of Germany, Flanders, Holland, Brabant, Cologne, who were to supply him with a number of Horse, in proportion to the Sums he gave them. All these Troops drawn together, and joined to the English, would have made a very numerous Army. But these and other Alliances were not near so advantageous to him, as that procured him by Robert d'Artois, with James d'Artois, a Brewer of Ghent. The Credit of that Burgher was so great in Flanders, that he had caused the principal Cities to revolt against the Earl (5). This Prince was even reduced to the Necessity of flying for refuge into France, till Philip, who had engaged to restore him, was able to accomplish his Promise. Edward, taking advantage of this juncture, offered his Protection to the Flamings, who gladly accepted it, apprehensive as they were, of being oppressed by Philip. This Alliance was the more advantageous,

The Parliament (1), who approved of his Design, having granted him large Subsidies to carry it on, he raised one of the finest Armies that had ever been levied in England. Till all his Allies were ready to act, he sent part of his Troops to the Relief of the Flemings, whom their Earl was vigorously attacking, with the Assistance of the French. Upon the Arrival of these Troops, Guy, Brother of the Earl of Flanders, who was posted in the Isle of Cadzant, was defeated and taken Prisoner. This successful beginning of the English Arms, broke the Measures of the Earl of Flanders, that the Cities, which till then had been for him, declared against him.

Whilft Edward was making his Preparations for this important War, the Object of all his Cares, he summoned a Parliament (2). The principal Business was to settle the Woollen-Trade, which was of very great Consequence to the Kingdom. In this Parliament, he created Prince Edward his eldest Son Duke of Cornwall, being the first in England that bore the Title of Duke (3).

When the King was almost ready to begin the War, he wrote to the Pope and Cardinals, to justify his Enterprize against France. He complained in his Letters, that tho' after the Death of Charles the Fair his Uncle, the Crown was devolved to him as next Heir, he was deprived of it by a rash and unjust Sentence: That the Ambassadors sent to Paris to demand the Crown, not only were not heard, but were treated with that Violence even to be threaten'd, and put in danger of their Lives: That by taking from a Minor the Crown, which of Right belonged to him, the Peers of France acted like Robbers rather than Judges; and that he protested against whatever was done during his Nonage. Then he said, that Philip de Valois, not content with usurping the Kingdom of France, had before any declaration of War, unjustly seized Guienne and the Earldom of Ponthieu, and without Cause, united these two Provinces to the Crown: That he had countenanced the Scotch Rebellion, instead of assisting him, as he was obliged by the Bond of Affinity. Lastly, That by his whole Conduct he had shown himself to be his mortal Enemy, and extremely uneasy at every thing tending to the Honour of England (4).

These Letters being communicated to Philip, he answered, That by the Salic Law, and the Judgment of the Peers, Edward was excluded from the Succession to the Crown of France, to which otherwise he could pretend no manner of Right, since he was born out of the Kingdom: That for his part, not only all the French had received him for King, but Edward himself had submitted to their Judgment: That the Homage he had done in Person, and confirmed by his Letters Patents, was a clear evidence, that he was himself convinced of the groundlessness of his Pretensions. Edward replied, That his Protestation in the Presence of his Council before he went and did Homage, prevented its being any Prejudice to him: That the Fear of losing his Lands in France, was the sole Motive of it; which, added to the Consideration of his Minority, was more than sufficient to invalidate, whatever had been hitherto done. Of these two Reasons, the first would hardly have been admitted in a Court of Justice: but it was not there this famous Process was to be decided. Mean time, Edward willing to show his Allies, he was too far engaged in the Contest to recede, ordered the Duke of Brabant to demand the Crown of France in his Name. At the same Time he made him his Lieutenant-General for that whole Kingdom, with Orders to the French, whom he called his Subjects, to pay him Obedience.

To try to prevent the Evils, which a Quarrel of this Nature might bring upon Christendom, Benedict XII, who then filled the Papal Throne, used all his Interest with two Kings. But as Edward was the Aggressor, the Pope sent first to him two Cardinals, with Instructions to use all possible endeavours to persuade him to Peace. These two Legates discharged their Commission with great Zeal, and were very urgent with Edward to put the Affair in Negotiation. They could not however help showing some Partiality in favour of France, because of Edward's Alliance with the Emperor, the Pope's professed Enemy. Nevertheless the King let them know, their Mediation was agreeable to him, and he would make Peace provided Terms were offered, answerable to his Rights. He even promised to defer the execution of his designs till next March. But this was no great Favour, since it was then December. He spent the rest of the Winter in preparing his Army and Fleet, and especially in strengthening the League with new Allies. Among whom, we find in the Collection of Edward the Publick Acts, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Duke of Austria, and the Dauphin of Viennois, who are all three reckoned by the Historians among the Allies of France. This gives occasion to presume they were first engaged with Edward, but afterwards suffered themselves to be gained by Philip. The Dauphin had entertained the Project of erecting his Dominions into a Kingdom: Which, probably, was the Reason of his joining with Edward, hoping without doubt that he would use his Interest with the Emperor to obtain his desire. This Project not succeeding, he espoused the Quarrel of France. The Earl of Hainault, being willing also to enter into the League, desired, that Edward might have the Title of Vicar of the Empire, in order to have a pretence to join Forces with him, as General of the Emperor's Army. To satisfy the Earl, and in expectation of bringing other German Princes to the same Resolution, Edward was pleased to demand that Dignity of the Emperor.

When he had taken all the Precautions suggested to him by Prudence, he departed from England, with a Fleet of five hundred Sail (5), and steered his Course towards Antwerp, where he was called by important Affairs. It was necessary he should be near his Allies, that he might take with them all proper Measures for the Execution of his Designs. Altho' his Ambassadors had concluded Alliances with several Princes, there were still many Things to be settled with them, before they could assemble their Forces. This was properly what retarded several Months the opening of the Campaign. But this delay was not entirely fruitless. During that time, Edward went and conferred at Cologne, with the Emperor (6), who ordered a Patent to be drawn up appointing him Vicar of the Empire, according to his desire. This sort of favour was attended with the Promise of a powerful Assistance, a Promise which was afterwards very lamely performed. The City of Flanders having entered into the League by means of James d'Artevillie, were grown apprehensive of being one day abandoned to the Vengeance of their Earl, and the King of France. It was therefore necessary for Edward to show himself to the Flemings, in order to encourage them by his presence. To that end he took a Journey to Ghent and granted the principal Cities several

But all these Affairs, though of great moment, were not the sole Cause of Edward's long Stay in Brabant. As his Expence was excessive (4), he endeavoured, during that time, to borrow Money of all the foreign Princes. He did not scruple even to apply to private Persons, and take up such Sums as they were willing to lend, though never so small: Nay, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he pawned his Crown to the Archbishop of Trier [for fifty thousand Florins.]

During Edward's Stay at Anwerp, his Queen was delivered there (5) of a Prince called Lionel. Here likewise he received a Letter from the Pope, representing to him in strong Terms, the Dangers he was exposing himself to, by his Alliance with Lewis of Bavaria, who stood excommunicated. At the same time, he reproached him, for undervaluing himself, in receiving from the pretended Emperor, the Title of Vicar of the Empire, so much beneath him. But these Remonstrances made little Impression, upon him. Though the Pope threatened to proceed to extraordinary Censures against him, he chose rather to run that hazard, than interrupt the Execution of his Designs.

Every thing being ready to open the Campaign, which had been retarded till September (6), Edward put himself at the Head of forty thousand Men, and encamped between Marchienne and Douay. Then he marched (7) towards le Cambresy, and halted some time before the Walls of Cambray. Here he was informed, that Philip was advancing with a formidable Army, to give him Battle. As this War was immensely expensive, and it was his Interest to end it at once; as soon as he received this Intelligence, he passed the Schelde, in order to meet his Enemy. A few Days after, the two Armies being encamped pretty near one another, about Pironfosse, Philip sent a Herald to offer him Battle, on condition it should be on a Plain where there was no Incumbrance. Edward accepted the Challenge, and left him to appoint the Time and Place. The 22^d of October was fixed for the Decision of this famous Quarrel. But whilst both Sides were preparing with equal Ardour for Battle, Philip was discouraged by a Letter from Robert King of Naples. This Prince, who pined for a great Antidote, foretold him ill Success, wherever he fought the English. At length, this was what several Historians affirm; adding, that upon the Credit of this Prediction, Philip retired, not daring to venture a Battle. Others however maintain, with more likelihood, that this Letter would not have induced him to take such a Step, if the great Men, who attended him, had not checked his Ardour by more prudent Counsels. It is said, they represented to him, that in the Battle which was going to be fought, he hazarded no less than his Crown; whereas Edward ventured only Soldiers, most of whom were not his own; and, upon this Remonstrance, he resolved, though with great Reluctance, to give his Enemy this small Advantage. When Edward saw there was no likelihood of bringing Philip to a Battle, he marched into Hainault. This is Froissart's Account, who is accused by the French of being, on all occasions, too partial to the English. Nangis, a French Historian, gives a quite contrary Relation, by saying, Edward retired first, not to hazard a Battle. This is not the only Instance of the like Contradiction among the Historians. It seems however, that on this occasion it is not likely, Edward, who passed the Schelde to meet Philip, should retire for fear of fighting. But Philip's Reasons for not venturing a Battle are very strong. The Honour of a King or General, consists not in fighting upon every opportunity, but only at a proper Season; and in not venturing the loss of a Kingdom without extreme Necessity. Be this as it will, the first Campaign ended without any Bloodshed, except in Guineas, where the two Parties made War upon one another. But as nothing very remarkable happened, I shall not stay to relate the Particulars (8).

It was not possible for Edward to return to England so soon as he desired, being detained in the Low-Countries by a troublesome Affair, created by underhand Practices, The King of France, vexed to see the Advantages his Enemy reaped by his Alliance with the Flemings, found it mean, by the help of his Emiffaries, to raise in the Cities of Flanders a Scruple for taking up Arms against their Sovereign Lord. This Scruple, inflamed by the Ecclesiasticks, most of whom were in the Interests of France, had already made a deep Impression on the Minds of the People. Perhaps it would have caused in Flanders some Revolution prejudicial to England, had not James d'Artois found a speedy Remedy, by advising Edward to assume the Title of King of France. This Proposal being debated in the King's Council, it was approved as a proper means to keep the Flemings in the League. And indeed, Edward reaped from it the Advantage he was made to expect. Pursuant to this Advice, he filed himself King of France, and quartered with his own Arms the Fleur-de-luce of France. He added this Motto, DIEU ET MON DROIT (1), declaring thereby, that he put his whole Confidence in God, and the Justice of his Cause. This new Title was not very surprising, since all his foregoing Proceedings were clear Evidences of his Design. Some time after, he refused Philip the Title of King, and forbid all his Ministers to give him any other but that of Earl of Valois. Besides, he had appointed the Duke of Brabant his Lieutenant-General in France, and by that, had sufficiently shown, he thought himself the true King; though he had not yet ventured to take the Name. Having broken the Ice on account of the Flemings, he made no scruple to use the Title of King of France in all Publick Acts, and to mark this Year as the first of his new Reign. At the same time he published a Declaration (2), notifying to the French, that the Kingdom of France being devolved to him by the Death of Charles the Fair, according to God's Will, which he would not oppose, he was resolved to assume the Government. He gave his new Subjects all the usual Promises on the like occasions, and offered his Protection to such as, after the Example of the Flemings, would own him for their Sovereign. The same Day he published a Manifesto, containing a particular Account of the pretended Injuries received from Philip de Valois, and the Offers made by himself in order to a Peace, that they might unite their Forces against the Infidels.

Though Edward had entered into Engagements with the Duke of Brabant, to stay in the Low-Countries till the War was ended, it was not possible for him to keep his Promise. His Affairs necessarily called him into England. But to satisfy the Duke, he left him in Hostage four English Lords (3) of the first Quality, besides his Queen and the new-born Prince, who continued at Antwerp for Pledges of his Return. After this Affair was thus settled, he passed into England, where he arrived in February (4). Presently after he summoned a Parliament (5), which, upon granting him a considerable Subsidy, obtained from him the Confirmation of Magna Charta. Before they broke up, the Lords and Commons presented an Address, praying that the Title of King of France, used in the Publick Acts, might have Influence on the Affairs relating to England. This was too reasonable not to be immediately granted. He had not yet acquired one Foot of Land in France, this new Title was not displeasing to the English, who fancied their King was become the Greater for it. But Pope Boniface was not pleased with it at all. He used his utmost Endeavour to persuade the King to quit the Title, affirming he had no Right, by reason of the Same Law, concerning which, Philip had taken care to instruct him to his Advantage. But his Exhortations were ineffectual.

Though the first Campaign had produced no considerable Loss, Edward's Preparations were a plain Indication, that he expected greater Matters from the second. He had increased his Fleet to three hundred (6) Sail of Ships in the War, and his Army was much more numerous than the former. Every thing being ready about Midsummer (7), he embarked for Flanders, though he had Intelligence, that the French Fleet, consisting of four hundred Sail, waited for him in the way to Sluys. His eager desire of acquiring Fame, causing him to receive the News with more Joy than Surprise (8), he resolved to open a Passage through the Enemy, notwithstanding their Superiority. He met them on the Coast of Flanders, as he expected, and without Hesitation began the Engagement. This was the greatest and most memorable that had been yet seen in those Seas, and the first wherein the King of England commanded in Person. The Ships, for the most part, grappled one another, both Sides fought without stirring, as if they had been at

Land; and from eight in the Morning, till seven at Night. If Edward's Valour filled the Soldiers with Admiration, his Conduct raised no less Wonder in the Manner, who were amazed to see him give Orders with such Prudence and Forethought, that one would have thought he had commanded at Sea all his Life. The Presence and Resolution of the King, who appeared where-ever was most Danger, so encouraged his Men, that they fought with an astonishing Bravery. The French behaved on their part, with great Courage; but, after sustaining several Hours the Efforts of the English, they were forced at last to leap into the Sea, to avoid the Sword of their Enemies. Of the whole French Fleet, but thirty Ships escaped (9), the rest being either taken or sunk. So Edward's Victory could not be more complete. The English pretend, the French lost thirty thousand Men. This grievous Misfortune was long unknown to Philip, no one daring to carry him the News, till his Butcher, by an unlucky Jest, gave him occasion to discover it (10).

Edward's good Success in this Engagement, afforded him an opportunity, of peaceably landing his Troops in Flanders, where he assembled the finest Army that was ever commanded by any King of England. It consisted of one hundred and fifty thousand Men. English, Germans, Flemings, and Gascons. With these numerous Forces he besieged Tournay (11), after detaching fifty thousand Men, under the Conduct of Robert d'Artois, who posted himself near St. Omer, to favour the Siege. These last Troops were chiefly composed of the Militia of Flanders, who knowing nothing of Military Discipline, went one day, without order, to the Number of eighteen thousand, to attack the Suburbs of St. Omer, with design to plunder. The Duke of Burgundy, who had thrown himself into that Place, not being able to bear this Bravado, sallied out upon them, and slew above three thousand. This loss would have been inconsiderable, had it not produced a fatal Effect. The same night, the English Troops, seized with a panic Fright, quitted their Camp in great disorder, and shamefully retired, some to their own homes, others into Edward's Camp. Some affirm, there was on this occasion a Battle, wherein Robert d'Artois was entirely routed by the Duke of Burgundy. But Froissart, a contemporary Author, who relates this Event in the above-mentioned manner, seems more worthy of Credit, than after-Writers.

Mean time, Philip, at the head of an Army much stronger than Edward's, was advancing to the relief of Tournay. He was accompanied by the Kings of Navarre and Bohemia, with all the Nobility of his Kingdom. His design was not however to engage, but only to harass the Besiegers, in order to oblige them to raise the Siege. Edward quickly perceiving Philip's Intent, was very sensible how difficult it would be to take the Town, whilst the French Army was so near. Accordingly, to oblige his Enemy to alter his purpose, he sent a Herald with a Letter (12), challenging him to single Combat, or offering to decide their Quarrel by a hundred on each Side, or else by a general Battle. The Letter was directed, To Philip de Valois, without any other Title. Philip answered, "He had sent a Letter addressed to one Philip de Valois, but as it was not for him, returned no answer to the Contents; nevertheless he took this occasion to acquaint him, that with God's Help, he hoped to drive him in a short time out of his Territories."

It was difficult to forward the Siege of Tournay, by reason of the French Army, which never ceased Night and Day to harass the Besiegers. Edward was three Months before the Town, without making any great Progress; and yet could not resolve to raise the Siege, though there was little likelihood of Success. He was in great Perplexity, but freed from it by Joanna de Valois his Mother-in-law, Sister of the King of France, and 1340. Widow of the late Earl of Hainault. This Princess, who was retired to the Abbey of Pontenelle after the death of her Husband, came from her retreat on this occasion, to try to reconcile the two Monarchs, one her Brother, the other her Son-in-law. She so managed it, that at length she prevailed with them to consent to a Truce, which was to last from the 20th of September, to the 25th of June the next Year. It was afterwards prolonged for two Years by the Pope's Mediation. As soon as the Truce was signed, Edward departed for England (1) with his Queen, who had lived three Years in the Low-Countries. She had been delivered there of two Princes, namely, Lionel [at Antwerp,] and John at Ghent, known afterwards by the Name of the Duke of Lancaster (2).

It was a great Mortification to Edward to be obliged, by the Necessity of his Affairs, to make a Truce against his Inclination, and which in Effect broke all his Measures. Three very urgent Reasons compelled him to take this Step, which seemed so little agreeable to his vast Designs. First, the defection of the Emperor and the Duke of Brabant, who had both receded from the League. Secondly, the excessive Charge of maintaining so numerous an Army, for which the Money that came from England in less Sums than he expected, could not suffice. Lastly, it was only a Truce, which might in some measure save him the Shame of raising the Siege he had undertaken. These Reasons were not only sufficient to induce him to sign the Truce, but also indispensably engaged him to procure more Peace, in order to remedy the Inconveniences happened by the Levity of his Allies, and the exhausting of his Treasure. As for the Duke of Brabant, he allured him some time with the hopes of the fore-mentioned Marriage. He even demanded the Pope's Dispensation for it. But this Affair, whether obstructed by the King himself, or the Court of Rome, came to nothing. Whereupon the Duke of Brabant finding himself amused, withdrew his Troops, without openly breaking however with the King. As to the Emperor, the Affiance Edward received from him, was so inconsiderable, that he would not have been much weakened by that loss. But the Emperor, in making a private Peace with France, on pretence that Edward had concluded a Truce without him, had at the same time revoked his Patent of Vicar General of the Empire. This unexpected Accident, which caused some of the German Princes to go from the League, obliged Edward to take other Measures.

But Edward's chief Business was to consider how to pay his Debts, which were very considerable. Moreover it was necessary to find means to continue the War when the Truce should be expired, without being liable to the like Inconveniences. When he left England he settled his Affairs in such a Manner, that he did not question to receive punctually the Money he wanted to pay his numerous Army. But he was no sooner engaged in the Siege of Tournay, but contrary to his Expectation, he was in want of Money, and found himself thereby in very great Straits (3). Upon his Arrival at London, he highly complained of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom he had left Prime Minister in his Absence. He accused him of maliciously obstructing the levying of the Subsidy granted by the Parliament, though it was by his Advice and Instances, that he had engaged in the Undertaking. Moreover he complained, that having begun the Siege of Tournay upon the Archbishop's Assurances that nothing should be wanting, he saw himself abandoned when he had most need of Assistance. That the Archbishop had not only broke his Word, but likewise opposed all the Expedients offered to raise Money. In short, that he was the sole Cause of the Length and ill Success of the Siege of Tournay. The Archbishop, seeing himself thus exposed to the King's displeasure, who, not content with threatening him, was resolved not to spare him, attempted in his Turn to vex him. He complained of an extraordinary Levy of Money made since the King's Return, contrary to the Liberties of Magna Charta, and threatened the Collectors with Excommunication. His Aim was to raise a Commotion among the People. Probably, he would have carried his Revenge farther, if he had not perceived his Proceedings disapproved by the Parliament. As he was afraid of being abandoned, he chose, though somewhat of the late, to cast himself upon the King's Mercy. Edward very willingly received his Submissions, for fear of engaging in a Quarrel, which must have been prejudicial to him, by reason of his frequent occasion for the Clergy's Assistance.

Some have imagined the Archbishop suffered himself to be gained by the Pope, who was displeased with the War, and very much biased in Favor of France. There appeared quickly after a sensible Proof of the Pope's Partiality in his putting all Flanders under an Interdict, because the Flemings had been against the King of France, their Sovereign Lord. The Flemish Clergy observed the Interdict so strictly, that People were obliged to send into England for less scrupulous Priests to celebrate Divine Service. The Flemings received these Ecclesiastics without any Difficulty, and pretended to evade the Pope's Censures, by affirming they were built upon a wrong Foundation, since Edward was the real King of France, and Philip an Usurper.

The War undertaken by Edward against France, had succeeded so ill, that all his Expenses had not acquired him one Foot of Land in the Kingdom, he had taken King. Endeavours, there was no Appearance of his ever being able to exert the like. Consequently, it would probably make him desist from his Design. Besides, the Truce affording his Enemy leisure to prepare, he could have no hopes of surprizing him. And yet, it is hard to judge, whether the Negotiations set on foot for a Peace during the Truce were sincere on his Part, or intended only to amuse his Enemy. Be this as it will, if he really designed to make Peace, he was not long in that Mind. The Prospect of fresh Advantages from the Posture of Affairs in the Duchy of Bretagne, soon made him resolve to improve so favorable a Juncture. The share England had in the Quarrel concerning the Succession of that Dukedom, obliges me to give some Account of the Cause, for the better Understanding of the Sequel.

ARTHUR II. Duke of Bretagne.

Arthur II, Duke of Bretagne, left three Sons by his first Wife; namely, John II, who succeeded him. Guy Earl of Ponthieu, and Peter. By a second Wife he left a fourth Son called John, who was Earl of Montfort by his Mother. John II, and Peter had no Issue. Guy, who died in 1330, left a Daughter named Joanna, who was given by her Uncle John in Marriage to Charles de Chastillon, Brother of Lewis Earl of Blois. He was generally called Charles de Blois. John II dying in 1341, there remained two of the Family, John Earl of Montfort, and Joanna his Niece, Wife of Charles de Blois. They both laid Claim to the Dukedom. Joanna by right of Representation, as Daughter of Guy elder Brother of John of Montfort, and this last as Brother of the late Duke, and consequently one Degree nearer than his Niece. He pleaded likewise the advantage of his Sex; a Reason of little Weight, since Bretagne owned not the Authority of the Salic Law. But Charles had a great advantage over his Competitor; namely, his being Nephew to Philip de Valois, who was to decide the Affair. On the other hand, the Earl of Montfort had so managed, that immediately after the Death of the Duke his Brother, he got possession of Bretagne, and caused the greatest Part of his Subjects to swear Fealty to him: Nay, he was now gone to England, where he had privately done Homage to 1341. Edward, acknowledging him for King of France, and made an Alliance with him. By this Proceeding, of which Philip was informed, he entirely forfeited that Monarch's Favour, who had no great Kindness for him before. However, Philip, willing to observe the customary Formalities, ordered the two Competitors to be summoned before the Court of Peers, to defend their Rights, and receive Judgment. Montfort very imprudently repaired to Paris, imagining, what he had done in England was still a Secret. But at his first Audience, he found what he was to expect from the King; who plainly told him, he had no Pretensions to Bretagne, and reproached him for his Homage to the King of England. Montfort confessed he had been in England to see his Friends; but denied the Homage. But Philip being better informed than he imagined, commanded him not to stir from Paris, and appointed a Day for the Judgment of the Process. It was easy for Montfort to see, what danger both his Cause and Person were in. So, taking a sudden Resolution, he made his Escape from Paris, disguised like a Merchant, and repaired to Bretagne. This did not hinder in his Absence the Decision of the Affair, in favour of Charles de Blois, who was declared Duke of Bretagne, and forthwith admitted to Homage. It is pretended, that in this Judgment the Peers observed not all the Formalities requisite in Causes of this Nature, and that their Proceedings were not altogether regular. As to the main of the Affair, though this Decision was directly contrary to That in the Case of the Earl of Artois, yet pretended, the Diversity of the Customs of the two Countries was the Reason; for in Bretagne, Representation took place, but was not received in Artois. Be this as it will, Philip being highly provoked with the Earl of Montfort, for doing Homage to the King of England, confiscated the Lands of Montfort, but to make up this Loss, Edward gave him in England the Earldom of Richmond. Shortly after, John, eldest Son of Philip de Valois, being commissioned to execute the Decree given in favour of Charles de Blois, entered Bretagne, at the head of a powerful Army, and Montfort retired to Nantes, where he was immediately besieged. Quickly after, the City being taken, and Montfort made Prisoner, he was conducted to Paris, and committed to the great Tower of the Louvre.

This Event would doubtless have ended the Quarrel between the two Candidates; but Margaret of Flanders, Wife of John de Montfort, undertook to support her Husband's Interests, in spite of the ill Situation of his Affairs. She came to London with her Son, a Child of four Years old, and renewed the Earl her Husband's Alliance with Edward. By this new Treaty, the positively engaged, to put into the hands of the English all the Places, still in her Power; and, to be better assured of the Assistance of England, concluded a Marriage between her Son, and one of Edward's Daughters, and left the young Prince at the English Court, to be educated, or rather to be an Hostage. This Treaty procuring Edward an entrance into Bretagne, and by that means, an opportunity of attacking Philip from that Quarter, he forthwith dispatched Robert d'Artois thither (1). Robert quickly became Master of Vannes, and then ordered Rennes to be besieged. Whilst his Troops were employed in the Siege, the Heads of the contrary Party, knowing he staid at Vannes with a few Troops, invaded the Town, and carried it by Storm. Robert being mortally wounded, with great difficulty escaped to Hennebont, where he died of his Wounds. Edward received the News of his Death with Grief. He swore to revenge it; and kept his Oath but too punctually. Robert d'Artois's Expedition into Bretagne, gave Philip occasion to complain, that Edward had violated the Truce, and to be even with him, he caused Hostilities to be renewed in Guenne. Thus the two Monarchs prepared again for War, by mutually accusing one another of breaking the Truce.

The Earl of Northampton (2), who had taken the Command of the English Troops in Bretagne, after the Death of Robert d'Artois, was unable to make any Progress, so small an Army. Mean time, it was of great moment to Edward, to become master of that Duchy. And therefore he resolved to go thither in Person with more Forces (3). Upon his Arrival, he besieged at once Nantes, Rennes, Vannes, and Guingamp. Philip knowing how prejudicial to him the Settlement of the English in Bretagne might be, resolved to drive them thence at any rate. To that end he raised an Army of fifty thousand Men, under the Command of the Duke of Normandy, his eldest Son. The young Prince marching with the utmost Expedition, had the good Fortune to enter Bretagne, before any of the Places besieged were taken. His approach obliged the King of England to raise these four Sieges, and draw all his Troops together, which were still inferior to the French. The two Armies remained the best part of the Winter, encamped near each other, but so well intrenched, that neither of the Leaders showed any Inclination to engage. The Duke of Normandy was unwilling to run any hazard, because having done what he wanted, he was in hopes of starving his Enemies. Edward cared as little to venture a Battle, unless forced, against an Army much stronger than his own. Whilst these two Princes lay thus encamped, two Legates from Clement VI., the new Pope, had time to arrive, and negotiate between the two Crowns a Truce for three Years (4), wherein all the Allies on both Sides were included. They made the two Kings likewise promise to send Ambassadors to Avignon, to treat of a Peace by the Pope's Mediation (5).

Whilst Edward was employed in his Wars with France, the Scots improved that Diversion to try to recover their Liberty. Since Edward quitted Scotland, King David's Adherents had gained great Advantages over Baliod, who commanded the English Army, but had not sufficient Forces to stop their Progress. Robert Stuart, Regent of Scotland for King David, maintained, by his Valour and Conduct, the Interests of the young exiled Prince. He was bravely seconded by William Douglas, and some other Lords, who still retained an inviolable Fidelity for their lawful Sovereign. Though a Body, commanded by Douglas, received a sad Loss, Robert still continued to keep his ground. He even saw himself, shortly after, in a condition to besiege Perth, or St. Johnston, the strongest Place the English had in Scotland. The Siege lasted three Months, by reason of the Besiegers great want of Ammunition. But a seasonable Supply from France enabled them at length to take the Place. This Loss obliged Baliod to quit the Center of the Kingdom, and retire to the Borders, where he sheltered himself, by means of the Places he had resigned to the English. The Truce concluded before Turnay, wherein Scotland was included, obliged Stuart to lay down his Arms for some time. But no sooner was the Truce broken, on account of the Affairs of Bretagne, but the Scots re-assembled and besieged Sterling, of which they became Masters, after numberless Assaults without any Intermision.

This Progress convincing Edward of his mistake, in imagining that Kingdom was disabled from giving him any Trouble, he resolved to invade it once more by Sea and Land. To that purpose, he repaired to the Frontiers (6), where he waited for his Fleet, which was to join him at Newcastle. But a violent Storm, which lasted several days, rendered his Ships unserviceable for the rest of that Year. This sad Accident hindered his entering Scotland, as it deprived him of the Provisions and Ammunition, on board his Fleet. He could not expect to find any in the Enemy's Country, because the Scots themselves destroyed them, to deprive his Army of the means of subsisting. However, their Ignorance of his State, freed him from his present Difficulties. As they saw themselves much inferior to that Prince, who threatened their Country with utter Desolation, they humbly sued for a Truce, which they thought themselves very happy in obtaining. Edward took care not to refuse it, but taking Advantage of their Terror, would grant it only upon this Condition: That they should own him for Sovereign of Scotland, and renounce their Allegiance to King David, in case that Prince came not in Person into that Kingdom before May next ensuing, with an Army strong enough to give Battle. This Condition put the King of France under a Necessity of assisting his Ally, better than he had hitherto done, for fear of being deprived of the Advantages, procured by the frequent Divisions of the Scots. Wherefore, he furnished King David with Men and Money, and sent him into Scotland (7), where he levied a very considerable Army, consisting, as it is said, of sixty thousand Men, Scots, 1343. French, Dutch, and Norwegians. With these Troops he marched towards the Frontiers of England, and penetrated as far as Durham, which he besieged. In a few days, he took the City, and put all the Inhabitants to the Sword. He would have proceeded, but, upon Advice, that Edward was hastening to give him Battle, he relented to retire; his Generals representing to him, that he could not stay any longer in England, without exposing himself to the hazard of a Battle, which might at the same time endanger his Kingdom. Whilst he was marching back to Scotland, the Garrison of Black Castle, belonging to the Countess of Salisbury, falling upon some of his Troops that stayed behind, he was so incensed, that he resolved to take the Castle. He stormed it several times, but was bravely repulsed by the Countess's People, who was herself in the Place. This Resistance, and the News of Edward's Approach, made him desist. He could not retire more seasonably, since Edward came that very day to the Castle. He paid a Visit to the Countess of Salisbury (1), which has given occasion to some Historians to say, he fell desperately in Love with her. It would be easy to confute what they groundlessly advance; but as his Love, whether true or false, produced no remarkable Event, it will be needless to say any thing of it. Next day, Edward continued his march in quest of the Enemy, but being informed, the Scots were retired to Gedour's (2) Forest, he ceased his Pursuit. As his Affairs were not yet in a good Posture in Scotland, this War was very unseasonable, with regard to the Measures he was to take with France; he sent David an offer of a two Year's Truce, which was accepted with Philip's Consent. This Truce helped the King of Scotland to fix himself more firmly in his Throne, and gave the King of England time to think of his other Affairs.

Edward's Thoughts for many Years were so wholly engrossed by Military Affairs, that he had not been able to find time to redress several Grievances complained of by the People, and which highly deserved a particular Attention. When the Truce with France and Scotland afforded him some Respite, he called a Parliament (3) to consult of Means, to secure the Welfare and Tranquillity of the Nation. During this Session, which lasted good part of the Winter, the Parliament made it their chief Business to enact divers Regulations, very beneficial to the People, and not opposed by the King. On the contrary, Edward very solemnly confirmed all the Liberties contained in the Magna Charta; showing thereby, that he had no less at heart the Good of his People, than his own, or that of his Successors. Among the several Acts passed in this Parliament, one of the most important was the Statute of Provisions, that is, an Act against those who brought Provisions from the Court of Rome for Benefices. The former Popes very much abused the Power they assumed, to dispose of the Benefices of the Kingdom. Nay, without staying till they were vacant, they frequently conferred them on Persons, who were to take possession upon the death of the present Incumbent, which raised loud Complaints from the Patrons. Clement VI., proceeding, in this respect, rather than any of his Predecessors, the Parliament was forced to complain of it to him, but to no manner of purpose. Instead of reforming this Abuse, which was the more intolerable, as all the Benefices were bestowed upon Foreigners, the Pope exhorted the King in a Letter, to withdraw the Complaints against the Provisions, which, in his Opinion, were an undeniable Prerogative of the Holy-See. This Letter showing, it was in vain to expect any redress from the Pope, the Parliament resolved to provide against this Evil by their own Authority. To that end, the fore-mentioned Statute was passed, whereby it was Death (4) for any Person, to bring for the future, the like Provisions into the Kingdom. Though this Statute extremely displeased the Pope, he thought fit to be silent, being informed that the King and Parliament were resolved to support it, and condemn his Centuries, in case he had recourse to them. However, not to suffer his pretended Right to be entirely lost, he feigned to take no notice of the Statute. But although he afterwards granted, from time to time, several Provisions, it was with such Caution, that the Abuse was considerably lessened during this whole Reign. On the other hand, the King, who had no mind to break with the Court of Rome, was content with setting the Statute in Force, without a rigorous Execution. But, as amongst the Laws, under Edward's Successors, the Popes had no more to their former Courtesies, there was a necessity frequently to renew this Statute, which was called the Statute of Provisions, containing, besides the Prohibition of Provisions, several other Cases concerning the Disputes with the Popes (5).

In this Parliament the King created Edward's eldest Son, Prince of Wales, and invested him with a Coronet, and a Ring of Gold: This Prince was then thirteen Years old, and gave great hopes of what he would one day prove.

Whilst Edward seemed wholly employed with domestic Affairs, he neglected not foreign Affairs. His Mind was continually on the Rack, to find Means to renew the War with France, the moment the Truce was expired. He appeared however inclinable to Peace, and continued, at the Court of Rome, Negotiations, which daily met with fresh Obstacles. But, whether his View was only to amuse his Enemy by these Negotiations, or he expected them to be successful, he neglected not his Preparations for War. He had found his little Advantage in his Alliances with the Princes of Germany, and the Low-Countries, who had caused him to consume such immense Sums to no Purpose, that he resolved to take another Course. To that end, he dispatched into the Low-Countries and Germany, Agents, with Power to treat with all sorts of Persons, that were willing to supply him with Men or Money. Besides, that all these Aids, when drawn together, would produce the same Effect with much less Expence, he hoped to be able to dispense of his Troops more absolutely, than he had done those of the Princes. Moreover, his aim was to render Philip's intrigues more difficult, whereby he was perpetually endeavouring to corrupt his Allies. For the better accomplishing his Design, and to draw into his Kingdom Multitudes of foreign Lovers, with whom he might in Person negotiate, he bethought himself of an Expedition, which could not fail of Success, because it was entirely agreeable to the Taste of that Age. He ordered Tournaments to be published, and gave an honorable Reception to all Persons of Distinction, that were pleased to be present, causing them in such a manner, that they could never sufficiently admire his Politeness, Magnificence, and Liberality. To render these Entertainments the more solemn, and to free himself from the Ceremonies, to which the Difference of Rank and Condition would have obliged him, he caused a circular Hall of Boards to be run up at Windsor, two hundred foot in Diameter. There it was that he feasted (6) all the Knights at one Table, which was called the Round Table, in Memory of the great Arthur, who as it is pretended, instituted an Order of Knighthood by that Name. Next Year he caused a more solid Building to be erected, that he might continue yearly the same Diversions. During that time, he treated with these several Lords about the Aids wherewith each could furnish him, in proportion to his Forces. The Collection of the Publick Aids, is full of the Treaties with private Persons, managed either by himself, or his Agents. Philip could not see without Jealousy, Spaniards, Italians, German, Flamings, and Frenchmen themselves, flock to England to assist at the Tournaments. He suspected some hidden design in these Entertainments, and to break Edward's Measures, caused the like to be published in his Dominions (7). This way of opposing his Enemy was in itself just and honorable; but soon after he used other means that was not so generally approved, and was attended with great Consequences. It is affirmed, that having drawn to Paris, under colour of a Tournament, Olivier de Clifton, and ten or twelve other Lords of Bretagne, who attended Charles de Blois, he commanded their Heads to be cut off, without any Formality of Justice. But it appears by a Letter from Edward to the Pope upon this Occasion, that Philip did not assure these Lords to Paris, but apprehended them in Bretagne. As this Action was the Cause of breaking the Truce, it will be necessary to explain it; for there is no other way of knowing who was Author of the Rupture. Olivier de Clifton a Lord of Bretagne, having served Charles de Blois during the War, was taken Prisoner by Edward, who having probably gained him, confessed he should be exchanged for an Englishman (1). Whether Philip had Proof of his having changed Sides, or only suspected it, he ordered him to be apprehended in Bretagne, with ten or twelve Lords and Gentlemen, and conducted to Paris, where their Heads were struck off. I believe I may venture to affirm, these Lords were apprehended in Bretagne, because the Pope in his Answer to Edward's Letter, and in his vindication of Philip, to the utmost of his Powers, said not a word tending to the contrary. But perhaps some of these Lords or Gentlemen were seized at Paris, and the rest in Bretagne, by Order of the King. What makes it so difficult to judge rightly of this Action of Philip's is, that, according to Froissart, Agostre, and all the French Historians, these Lords had all along opposed the Quarrel of Charles de Blais, and yet Edward in his Letter to the Pope, calls them his Adherents (2). They must therefore have changed Sides, either publicly or privately, after the Truce, and this is difficult to know precisely. It seems however, Edward would have had no reason to concern himself so much in this Affair, if these Lords had only been his private Adherents, whilst outwardly they continued all along attached to the Interests of France. This, added to Edward's Letter to the Pope, seems to prove at least, some of these Lords openly declared for the Earl of Montfort. Upon this Supposition, there is no doubt that Philip violated the Truce, in commanding them to be seized in Bretagne. But, on the other Hand, if these Lords are supposed to have been only Edward's secret Friends since the Conclusion of the Truce, the two following Questions may be put. First, whether Philip had a Right to cause them to be seized in Bretagne, during the Truce? Secondly, whether as Sovereign Lord of Bretagne, he might exercise such a Power over these Lords, especially as the putting them to Death is so illegal a Manner, was rather a Murder than an Act of Justice? Be this as it will, Edward pretended that by this Action the Truce was violated, and Philip maintained, that Edward used this wrong pretence to break it.

Edward was so enraged at the tragical Death of the Lords of Bretagne, that he was going to behead the Bretagne Prisoners of Philip's Party, which were in his Power. But upon the Remonstrances of Henry of Lancaster, he altered his Resolution. However, he sent for Henry de Luns, one of the Prisoners, and told him with great Emotion, that though the Death of his Countrymen beheaded at Paris, was a sufficient Reason to serve him in the same kind, he was unwilling to follow so bad an Example, or to revenge himself on the Innocent, but intended to punish the Author himself of that Barbarity. Then he said, though he might demand of him a Ransom of thirty or forty thousand Crowns, he would release him for ten thousand, on condition he would go in his Name and defy Philip, and declare to him, that having violated the Truce by this base Action, he must prepare for War.

These were not fruitless Menaces. Edward, in his Resolution to push the War with more Vigour than ever, ordered a Commission to be drawn up, constituting the Earl of Northampton his Lieutenant-General in France; commanding him at the same time to defy Philip, and declare War against him by Sea and Land. Shortly after he sent into Guenne, Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby (3), to begin Hostilities, till he should be able to go thither himself, desirous to exert himself most in that Province. Mean time, he sent for John de Montfort into England, who had made his escape from Paris, and received his Homage for Bretagne. He received likewise the Homage of Geoffrey de Haverant (4), for his Lands in Normandy confiscated by Philip; and promised by Letters Patents, either to recover his Estate, or give him an Equivalent in France or England. Shortly after, he published a Manifesto, concerning all the Injuries received from Philip de Valois. After setting forth, he exhorted the French to own him for Sovereign, promising to exempt them from Taxes, and govern them according to the Laws and Customs observed in France, under St. Louis his Predecessor. He forgot not to write to the Pope, to inform him of his Reasons to renew the War. But the Pope's Answer plainly showed him to be a partial Mediator. He not only excused Philip's Proceedings against the Lords of Bretagne, and charged Edward with being the first Violator of the Truce, but threatened also to exert his Apostolic Authority against him. This was sufficient to convince Edward, he could expect no Favour from the Pope. Accordingly he addressed himself to him no more, but only for Form sake, and to keep a Decree (5).

Whilst these things were transacting, Philip was trying to disengage the Flemings from the Interest of England. Educating of these Practices, suddenly passed into Flanders, where he stayed but three Weeks. At his Return, he pretended to have prevented the Mischiefs, he had reason to fear from the Inconstancy of the Flemings. But the Sequel showed, he had flattered himself too much, or the Flemings had deceived him; since it is certain they never more gave him any Assistance.

Mean time the Earl of Derby made a considerable Progress in Guenne, where he carried by Storm the Town of Bergerac, which was given up to be plundered (7). History ought not to omit making honorable mention of the Generosity of that General, seldom imitated by those of our Days. Whilst the English were busy in plundering the Town, a Welsh Knight chanced to light upon the Receiver's Office. He found there such a Quantity of Money, that he thought himself obliged to acquaint his General with it, imagining to great a Booty naturally belonged to him. But he was agreeably surprized, when the Earl told him with a pleasant Countenance, that he wished him Joy of his good Fortune, and did not make his word to depend upon the Greatness or Smallness of the Thing promised (8).

This Year the Scots, at the Instigation of the King of France, made an Inroad upon the Borders of England, but were repulsed by Edward's Troops in the northern Counties.

John de Montfort, who took the Title of Duke of Bretagne, died in September, leaving to the King of England the Guardianship of his Son, and to Margaret his Dutches the Management of a very important War (9).

Whilst these things passed, Edward lost the Assistance of a powerful Ally, by the Death of James d'Artois, who was torn in pieces by the Flemings (10). His Death entirely changing the Face of Affairs in the Low-Countries, it was by no means proper to attack France from that Quarter. For this reason Edward resolved to carry the Brunt of the War into Guenne. The Duke of Normandy had now entered that Province, at the head of sixty thousand Men (11), to stop the Progress of the Earl of Derby, and complete the Conquest thereof. Upon the Approach of this formidable Army, the Earl left the Field, and retired to Bourdeaux. His Retreat giving the Duke of Normandy an Opportunity of retaking several Places, he was at length engaged in the Siege of the Castle of Aguilin, seated upon the Confluence of the Gironne and Lot. This Siege was very remarkable, as the famous whole Week, stormed the Town three times a Day, for the brave Defence of the Besieged, who were not to be discouraged by so frequent Assaults. To relieve these brave Men, Edward hastened his Preparations, determining to go in Person, and oppose the Duke of Normandy's Progress (12).

Every thing being ready for his Departure, he came to Southampton, bringing with him the Prince of Wales his eldest Son, about sixteen Years old (1), who was to make his first Campaign. Before the Imbarcation of the Troops, he assembled his principal Officers, and exhorted them to behave, as should render them worthy of his Esteem, and the Rewards he designed for those that discharged their Duty. He declared, his Intention was to fend back his Ships the Moment he arrived in Guiney, and therefore it would be in vain to hope to see their own Country again, unless they returned victorious. He added, if any Man's Heart failed him, he need only speak freely, and he should instantly have his Leave to stay behind. This Speech being spread in the Army, the Soldiers cried out with one voice, they were ready to follow their King wherever he was pleased to lead them. So sudden and universal a Resolution, inspiring him with great hopes, he embarked his Troops with design to sail for Guiney: But the Wind proving contrary, he was forced to put back twice (2). Geoffrey de Harcourt, who attended him, made use of this Juncture to persuade him to land in Normandy, a very plentiful Country, which had been long exempted from the Calamities of War. Edward following his Advice, landed at la Hague in le Catentin, where he was by no means expected (3).

The Moment he set foot on Shore, he knighted the Prince of Wales his Son, and several other young Lords (4), after which, he headed his Army, consisting of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Men at Arms. He divided his Troops into three Bodies, who marched separately in the Day, but commonly rejoined in the Evening, in order to encamp all together. In their first marches, they revenged in a terrible manner, the death of the Lords beheaded at Paris. Valagne, St. Lo, Carentan, Harfleur, were the first Towns that felt the Fury of the English Arms. Ralph Earl of Eu, Constable of France, then at Caen, offering to oppose the English, with the Militia of the Country, served only, by his being defeated and made Prisoner, for a happy Preface of their future Victories. After the defeat of the Constable, Edward continued his burning and plundering of Lifieux and Evreux. He halted not till he deriding whatever came in his way. He halted not till he arrived at Poissy, where he stayed some days, to provoke Philip to engage, by sending a Herald to him with a Defiance, which was not accepted. Philip had another design, and that was to inclose him between the Seine and the Oyse. Had this Project succeeded, the English Army would have been unavoidably ruined. But Edward perceiving his Intent, thought somewhat of the latest, decamped from Poissy, in order to pass the Somme, and take Shelter in Pontieu; knowing his Enemy was advancing with an Army of a hundred thousand Men. He marched a good way down the Somme, without finding any passage. At last, he was so happy as to discover the Ford of Blanchetaque, by means of a Prisoner (5), who was perfectly acquainted with the Country. Though this Discovery seemed at first a great Advantage, he quickly found the difficulties of his Retreat were not much lessened. Philip foreseeing, the Enemy might take that Rout to retire, detached Gendemar du Fay with a Body of twelve thousand Men to guard that Ford, on which depended the Success of his Designs. Edward saw himself therefore under a Necessity, either of forcing the Passage, or fighting with great disadvantage his Enemy, who was closely pursuing him. Being come to a Resolution, he ordered his Troops to advance, who, being animated by the Presence of their King, cast themselves into the River with such Intrepidity, that they began to vanquish their Enemies before they came to the Charge. One may easily imagine the difficulties which occur in such a Passage, in the Face of the Enemy, who were so many, which cannot enlarge its Front beyond the breadth of the Ford, and is obliged to march through the Water, and at the same time handle their Arms. But all this was not capable of stopping the English, who, in the face of their King, Witnesses of all their Actions, marched through all these Obstacles, as to a certain Victory. It was not possible for the French to sustain so long an Attack. After some endeavours to repulse the English, they were forced to abandon that important Passage, through which Edward immediately marched his whole Army. The same Evening (6) he encamped at Creffy, whilst Philip passed the Somme at Abbeville, but three Leagues from thence.

Edward seeing himself so closely pursued, and perceiving it would be impossible to avoid fighting, stopped short to expect his Enemies, and chose an advantageous piece of Ground, where he drew up his Army. Philip being persuaded, that Edward's Retreat was the effect of his Fear, did not question, if he could but come up with him, he should quickly vanquish him. Accordingly, not to afford him time to retire any further, he marched next day from Abbeville with design to attack him. The English Army was divided into three Bodies, of which the Prince of Wales commanded the first (7). The second was led by the Earls of Northampton and Arundel (8), and the Lord Rofs. The King kept at some distance with the third (9), to assist those that should want it. Philip could not come in sight of the Enemy till three in the Afternoon, having marched that Day three Leagues, so that it was almost four o'Clock when the Battle began. He had likewise divided his Army (10) into three Bodies, the first whereof consisted of Genoese (11), under the Command of Antonio Doria, and Carah Ginaldi. As the chief Strength of his Infantry lay in these Troops, he would have them charge first. Just as the Battle was going to begin, a great and sudden Rain slackening the Strings of the Genoese Cross-Bows, they became unmanageable. However, as they were now too far advanced, they saw themselves exposed to a Shower of English Arrows, which made them give Ground. Charles Earl of Arundel, the King's Brother, who supported them with a great Body of Horse, seeing them give way, without knowing the Cause, imagined there was Treachery, and immediately ordered the Horse to fall upon them, by which rash Action he began to put the French Army in Disorder (12). Mean time, the Earl never troubling himself about the Genoese, nor minding what passed behind him, attacked the first Body of the English, commanded by the Prince of Wales, and was received with a Firmness he little expected. He continued however his Endeavours, which only caused him to lose his Life, valiantly fighting. By his Death the Body he commanded began by degrees to stagger, and as they could not be speedily supported, by reason of the Disorder caused by themselves among the Genoese Troops, were at length put to Flight.

The Prince of Wales having got great an Advantage in this first Onset, Philip ordered a numerous Body of Horse to advance, to repair the disorder caused by the Defeat of the first. Thus the French had always the Superiority in Number, though the English still kept their Ground. In all appearance, the young Prince, who fought with an heroic Courage, determined to conquer or dye, would have been overpowered by Numbers, if the Earls of Northampton and Arundel had not come to his Relief. Their Approach drew thicker more French Troops, the small extent of the Field not permitting the two Armies to engage all at once. So the Fight was very obstinate. The Valour of the Prince of Wales, which filled the English Generals with Admiration, made them at the same time extremely uneasy with regard to his Person, because of the superior Number of the En-

1346. mics. Apprehensive that some Misfortune might happen to him in the end, they speedily sent the King Word, that it was time to come to the Prince's Relief, who was like to be oppressed by Numbers. Far from being moved at this Message, Edward asked, whether his Son was still alive, and being told, he was not only alive, but fighting with an astonishing Valour; replied to the Messenger, Tell my Generals, that as long as my Son is alive, let them send no more to me, for the Honour of this Day shall be his, and he must now merit his Spurs. This Answer inspiring the Prince with fresh Courage, he broke through his Enemies, who were ready to surround him. His Troops imitating his heroic Bravery, seconded him so well, that the French began to give Ground, and at length to disperse in Confusion.

Philip had one Body left which had not yet engaged, at the Head whereof he was himself. Towards this Body the Prince of Wales directed his Steps, after routing the other two; and in this last Action it was that he acquired the greatest Honour. Philip, enraged to see his two Bodies routed and dispersed, performed Wonders, to snatch the Victory from the young Heroe before it was compleat. The King of Bohemia, who, though blind, would be present at the Battle, causing his Horfes's Bridle to be tied to those of two brave Knights, was slain according to his Will, in fighting for France. His Standard, on which were embroidered in Gold, three Ostrich-Feathers, with these Words, ICH DIEN, that is, I SERVE, was taken and brought to the Prince of Wales, who, in Memory of that Day, bore three Ostrich-Feathers for his Crest (1), with the same Motto. Mean time Edward, who fled with his Troops on a rising Ground, watched the proper time to Charge, being unwilling however to make too much haste, for fear of robbing the Prince his Son of part of his Glory. But in this state of inaction, he failed not to strike Terror into the French, who saw him ready to fall upon them with Advantage. Philip for his part, after many fruitless Attempts to repulse the English, rallied some of his Nobles and Men at Arms, and threw himself into the midst of the Battle, in order to animate his Troops by his Example. It must be confessed, that on this occasion he gave signal Proofs of an undaunted Valour. It was not till after being twice dismounted, and wounded in his Neck and Thigh, that he suffered himself to be led, though with extreme Pain, out of the Field of Battle.

His Retreat quite discouraging those of his Men that still maintained the Fight, they were entirely routed with the rest of the Army. Then it was that a dreadful Slaughter ensued of the flying Troops, who were pursued till the Night was far advanced. It is affirmed, that in this memorable Battle, the English began for the first time to use Canon, a thing yet unheard of in France. Four Pieces, planted on a little Hill, did great Execution among the French Troops, and struck them with such Terror, that the Success of this Day is partly ascribed to the Surprise of the French at this Novelty. France lost in this Battle, the King of Bohemia, the Earl of Arden Brother of the King, the Duke of Lorraine, the Earl of Flanders, the Earl of Blois, fifteen other great Lords of the Kingdom, twelve hundred Knights, and above four-score Standards.

When Edward found, by the hasty Flight of the Enemies, that his Victory was certain, he advanced to show his Son Marks of his extreme Satisfaction. Dear Son, said he, embracing him in his Arms, You have acquitted yourself nobly this Day, and truly deserve the Crown for which you have fought. The young Prince, out of Countenance at the King's Commendations, with a modest Silence, fell on his Knees, and asked his Father's Blessing, according to the Custom practised in England. The Night of this glorious Day was spent by the English in Rejoicings. But the King published in the Camp express orders, not to insult over the Misfortunes of the vanquished, exhorting his Army to return God Thanks for the Victory he was pleased to give them. On the 1346. Morrow, some Troops, sent to pursue the flying Enemy, meeting a Body of Militia, who, without knowing what had happened, were marching to Philip's Camp, slew seven thousand. It is said, the loss France suffered on the second Day, was greater than that of the Battle, as well by the defeat of the Militia, as by the Slaughter, or taking of the Soldiers, who in flying, were dispersed in the Country (2).

Edward continued some Days near the Field of Battle, to bury the dead, and take care of the wounded, as well those of the Enemy, as his own. Then marching through la Boulonnais, he approached Calais, in order to besiege it. This Place, which was exceeding strong, was no less incommensurable to the English, than Dunkirk has been in our days. In becoming master of it, he not only freed himself from a very troublesome Neighbourhood, but also opened a way into France. He invested it on the 8th of September, and summoned the Governor to surrender, threatening, in case of refusal, to put the Garrison and Inhabitants all to the Sword. John de Vienne, the Governor, answered, He owned no other King of France but the Person that committed to him the Custody of the Town, in whose Service he was resolved to live and die.

The King having taken an exact view of the Fortifications of Calais, found it would be very difficult to accomplish the Siege by force; so from the first, resolved to reduce the Place by Famine. For that purpose, he drew round the Town four Lines of Circumvallation, with regular Fortifications, resolutely bent not to relinquish his Enterprize till accomplished. The Governor, who saw the Preparations, foreseeing the length of the Siege, took care to send away all useless Mouths, that he might not be exposed to the Danger of wanting Provisions. Though, according to the Maxims of War, Edward was not obliged to take pity of these Wretches, who were to the Number of seventeen hundred, he received them however into the Camp (3), and gave them leave afterwards to go where they pleased (4).

Mean time, Philip, who was very uneasy concerning this Siege, sought all possible means to raise it. He saw but two proper for that purpose. The first, which was to attack the Lines of the Besiegers, could not be soon enough put in practice, to hope the Town would hold out till he was able to relieve it. The second was, to make a Diversion in England by the Arms of the Scots. This being deemed the speediest, he engaged the King of Scotland to make an Inroad into England. He did not question its Success, because all the English Forces were employed in France. It was to be presumed, the Alarm caused by this Invasion, would raise such Commotions, in England, that Edward would be forced to raise the Siege he had undertaken. David, looking upon the Interest of France as his own, and readily following the Suggestions of Philip, put himself at the Head of thirty thousand Men (5), and advanced as far as Durham (6). This unexpected Invasion, at such a juncture, alarmed the English, but however was not capable of disheartening them. Young Lime, left by the King his Father Guardian of the Realm, not being yet of Age to command an Army, Queen Philippa took upon her to repulse the Enemy. To that end, heading the Troops, drawn together from all parts with wonderful Expedition, she marched directly to the Scots, and offered them Battle. David was no less impatient to engage. He imagined nothing more easy, than to put to flight undisciplined Troops, commanded by a Woman. But the Success did not answer his Expectations. He not only had the Mortification to lose the Day, but also to see himself Prisoner in the Hands of the English (7).

Fortune was never weary of favouring Edward. As Charles de his Arms were victorious in France and England, so were they likewise in Bretagne. Sir Thomas Dagworth, who commanded the English Troops in that Country, twice defeated Charles de Blois, and took him Prisoner in the last Battle, fought near la Roche de Rien.

Mean time, the Siege, or rather Blockade of Calais, was still continued by Sea and Land. Edward had sent for seven hundred Ships to guard the Sea. As therefore nothing could be brought into the Town, it was at last reduced to Extremity. The sad Condition of the Besieged being discovered to the King by an intercepted Letter, he sent it immediately to Philip, and withal bid the Messenger tell him, he had no time to lose, if he intended to relieve the Place. Philip improving this Intelligence, speedily took the Field, and approached the English Camp with an Army of one Hundred and fifty thousand Men. He hoped to draw the Enemy out of his Intrenchments, by offering him Battle several times. But Edward was too wise to run any hazard, well knowing the Impossibility of forcing his Lines: Besides, he had good reason to expect, the Town would quickly be at his Mercy. So, without being moved with all these Defiances, he constantly answered, his Business there was to take Calais, and if Philip thought fit to hinder him, he had only to take the most proper measures.

Philip seeing he could not without manifest danger attack him in his Intrenchments, nor draw him into the open Field, sent two Cardinals with Proposals of Peace. He offered him Guienne, the Earldom of Ponthieu, and a Marriage between their Children. Edward made a Jest of these Offers. He replied, Guienne and Ponthieu belonged to him; that he should quickly be master of Calais, and so had no need of his Bounties.

This Project not succeeding, Philip proposed to him by a Herald, to decide their Quarrel by a Combat of six on each side. The Herald adding, the King of France would appoint the Time and Place; the Earl of Derby made answer, That must be Edward then, since he is the true King of France. This Pretension alone, was sufficient to cause the Proposal to fall to the Ground, to which it is certain Edward, in his present Circumstances, had no Inclination. His sole Aim was to take Calais, without putting that event to Arbitration. A few Days after he received a Recruit of seventeen thousand Men, brought him by his Queen from England. If we may believe some English Historians, this Supply came very seasonably, to enable him to have his Revenge of Philip. It is affirmed, he offered to fight him in open Field; to fill up his Trenches himself, and demolish his Works, provided he might have sufficient Security that nothing should be conveyed into Calais till after the Battle. It is added, that Philip refusing this offer, chose to retire.

Thus much is certain, he did not think proper to attack Edward in his Intrenchments. So, the Besieged despairing of being relieved, desired at length to capitulate. A Capitulation, deferred till the last Extremity, could not be of any great Advantage. Accordingly, Edward refused the Besieged all manner of Terms but That of Life; which he was willing to grant both to the Soldiers and the Inhabitants. However, he excepted out of the last, six of the principal Burgesses, to sacrifice them to his Vengeance, leaving the Inhabitants to chuse the Victims themselves. This Severity caused a great Consternation in the Town. It was very difficult to chuse these six Persons, and yet there was no time to lose. History ought not to pass over in Silence the generous Action of Eustace de St. Pierre, one of the chief Inhabitants. This brave Burgher seeing Fear and Despair painted on the Faces of his Countrymen, voluntarily offered himself to be one of the six. So uncommon a Magnanimity affected the rest to such a degree, that five more were quickly found, who, after his Example, devoted themselves for the Preservation of their Townsmen.

These six illustrious Burgesses, bent to appease the Conqueror's Rage, by the Sacrifice of their Lives, went out bare-footed, in their Shirts, with Halters about their Necks, and presented to him the Keys of the Town. They found him so highly incensed, that notwithstanding ing the Intercession of the Prince of Wales, and of the great Men about him, he commanded them to be led to Execution. But if he had Resolution enough to refuse that favour to the preffing Instances of his Son, he could not find in his Heart the same Inflexibility for the Queen. This good Princess, moved with the Misfortune of these miserable Men, casting herself at his Feet, intreated him with Tears in her Eyes, to pardon them for Christ's sake. How resolved soever he might be, he could not behold at his Feet a Queen, whom he so tenderly loved, without feeling his Heart relent, and in spite of the Resolution he had armed himself with, was overcome by her Intreaties. The Queen, not content with saving the Lives of these unfortunate Men, ordered Cloaths to be brought them; and after giving them an Entertainment in her own Tent, dismissed them with a Present to each of six pieces of Gold. An Action which did then, and ever will, redound to the Honour of that generous Princess.

Thus the important Town of Calais, after a Year's Siege, became subject to the Dominion of the English (1).

A few Days after Edward had made his Entry into Calais, he turned out all the Inhabitants, in order to people it with English. Probably, this Precautious was the means of England's keeping that Place two hundred Years. The Siege had been so long and fatiguing, that Edward thought himself obliged to give his Troops some repose, by consenting to a Truce proposed to him for one Year. Which done, he left a strong Garrison in Calais (2), and returned in triumph to England (3).

Never had the English Name been more glorious than at this time; and never had England enjoyed a more complete Happiness. If the Valour, Wisdom, and good Fortune of the Kings, gave an extraordinary Lustre to the Realm, the rare Qualities of the brave Prince of Wales, Her-Apparent to the Crown, afforded no less hopes for the future. The prodigious Plenty which immediately followed Edward's Victories, seemed also to demonstrate, that Heaven took a peculiar Care of the English (4).

To add still a fresh Lustre to Edward's Glory, Ambassadors from Germany arrived the next Year, with offers of the Imperial Dignity. The Election of Charles IV. who was now crowned at Bonn, not being agreeable to all the Electoral Princes, some (5) were resolved to make a new Choice. To that end, they cast their Eyes on the King of England, whom the Battle of Cressy, and taking of Calais, had rendered very famous. But Edward, who was not ignorant how much the Acceptance of this Dignity, at a like Juncture, had cost Richard, Brother of Henry III. was too wise to throw himself into the same Difficulties. Besides, he had need of all his Forces and Endeavours to acquire the Crown of France, which to him seemed a more substantial Good. On these accounts, he refused the Honour intended him by the German Princes, and declined taking so great a Burden upon him (6).

During the Prosperity enjoyed by the English, it is no wonder that Ease and Plenty threw them into the Excesses, that are the usual Attendants thereof. All the Historians unanimously affirm, an unbridled Debauchery at this time prevailed throughout the Kingdom; and the Women laying aside their Modesty, the great Ornament of their Sex, seemed to glory in the Loss of their Virtue. Nothing was more common, than to see them riding in Troops to the Tournaments, dressed like Cavaliers, with Swords by their Sides, and mounting their Steeds adorned with rich Trappings, without any regard to their Honour or Reputation. The Men's Excesses were no less scandalous. God permitted not these Disorders to go long unpunished. A terrible Plague, after raging in Asia, and part of Europe, spread itself into France, and from thence into England (7), where it made such Desolation, that one half of the Nation was swept away. London especially felt the Effects of its Fury, where, it is observed, in one Year above fifty 1349. thousand Persons were buried in a Church-yard belonging to the Cisterciens (1).

Though this terrible Scourge had been no more favorable to France, Philip was making great Preparations to renew the War, with a resolution to use all possible Endeavors to recover Calais. The loss of that Place lay heavy upon his Mind, because of the Consequences which he plainly foresaw. However, as he rightly judged, it would be very difficult to retake the Town by Force of Arms, he resolved to use a surer way, by bribing the Governor. The Lords of Montmorency and Charny, to please their Master, very readily took upon them the execution of this Project, and the Ignominy of the Action. But what Meserai says is not very likely, that they thought it no great fault to surprize the Town during the Truce. In all appearance, their Ignorance was not so great. However that be, they held private Intelligence with Amyri de Pavia the Governor, who promised to deliver up the Place for twenty thousand Crowns. This Sum being sent him, he found means to introduce by degrees into the Town, a hundred Men at Arms, and twelve French Knights, whom he concealed in the Castle (2). On the day appointed for the Performance of his Promise, the Lords of Charny and Ribemont lay in Ambush near the two Gates of the Town, in order to rush in, as soon as they were opened. So just were their Measures, that they thought themselves sure of Success. But they did not know all that had passed. A little before, Edward receiving some Intelligence of the Plot, sent for the Governor to London, and promised him Pardon, on condition he would betray the French. The Villain, perceiving himself inevitably ruined if he refused to comply with the King, fully informed him of all the Circumstances of the Plot, and the day agreed upon to let the Enemies into the Town. By this means Edward knowing how Matters stood, ordered it so, that he came the Evening before to Calais, attended by the Prince of Wales, and eight hundred Men at Arms (3). On the Morrow by break of day, he sallied out at one Gate, and the Prince of Wales at the other, to attack the French, who little expected any such thing. The King, who was pleased to fight on foot, under the Banner of the Lord Walter de Manny, engaged in single Combat with Eustace de Ribemont, a Knight of Picardy, by whose fierce Blows he was twice struck down on his Knees. The speedy Relief he received from his own Men, freed him from this danger, and even enabled him to defeat Ribemont's Troop, and take him Prisoner.

Whilst the King was thus employed, the Prince of Wales vigorously charged the Lord Charny, who, after a long Resistance, was at length defeated, and taken Prisoner by the Prince. The French lost in this Action, six hundred Men, besides a good Number of Prisoners, who, with their two Leaders, were brought into the Town, of which a few hours before they hoped to be Masters (4). Though the way they had used was far from being honorable, Edward, considering it was in obedience to their Sovereign, treated them very civilly. That very Evening he entertained the principal Prisoners with a splendid Supper, and was even pleased to come and see them whilst at Table. He could not forbear upbraiding Charny with the infamous means he had used, to take from him by Treachery, and during the Truce, a Place that cost him so dear, and was fairly won. Then addressing himself to Ribemont, he greatly commended his Valour, and made him a Present of a String of Pearls of great value, which he wore in his Cap, as a Testimony of his Esteem. He added, that hearing he was a great Admirer of the Ladies, he desired him to wear it in their Company, telling him, they would not look upon him with less favorable Eyes. After several other obliging Expressions, he gave him his Liberty without any Ransom. Before he left Calais, he made John de Beauchamp (5) Governor, not thinking it prudent to trust any longer the Custody of that important Place in the Hands of a Lombard, who had suffered himself to be bribed. But this was not all the Punishment the Traitor received for his double Treachery. The next Year, he had the misfortune to fall into the Hands of the French, who caused him to be torn in Pieces with four Horses.

The Attempt upon Calais failing, contrary to the expectation of the French, Philip disowned the Authors. As Edward was not ready to renew the War, he was contented with that slight Satisfaction; so the Truce still subsisted, notwithstanding the just Cause given by Philip to break it.

Edward having nothing more to do at Calais, returned to England, where soon after he instituted the famous Order of the Garter (6). According to the common opinion, this Order owes its Origin to an Accident in itself of little Importance, but in regard to its Consequences very remarkable, if it be true, that it gave Birth to the Institution of this Order of Knighthood. It is said, that Edward being at a Ball, where the Countess of Salisbury in dancing, dropped her Garter, stooped to take it up; that the Lady imagining he had some other design, and showing her Surprise, he said to her, to clear himself, Honi soit qui Mal y Pense, Evil to him that Evil thinks. It is added, that in Memory of this Accident, he instituted the Order of the Garter, to which he gave for Motto, the Words spoken to the Countess. An Origin, so little worthy of the Lustre wherewith this Order has all along shone since its Institution, appears at first sight so very offensive, that several ingenious Wits have endeavored to find out a more honorable. Some affirm, the Reason of Edward's instituting this Order, was, because on the day of the Battle of Cressy, he had given Garter for the Word. Others say, it was, because on that day he ordered his Garter to be fixed at the end of a Lance for the signal of Battle. Lastly, there are who advance, that Edward only revived and regulated an Order of Knighthood, begun by King Richard I. at the Siege of Acre in Palestine. They say, King Richard resolving to storm the Town, distributed to some of his principal Officers certain Leather-Strings to be tied round the Leg, to distinguish them during the Assault, and in memory of that Event, Edward instituted the Order of the Garter. But all this is said without sufficient Proof. Besides, whatever Endeavours have been used to give this Order a different Origin from the first above-mentioned, nothing has hitherto been found satisfactory concerning the reason of the Motto, HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE. This Motto agrees very well with the first Circumstance, but has no Connexion with those substituted in its room. It is no less uncertain why the Knights wear the Garter on their Left rather than on the Right Leg, or why the Founder chose to put the Order under the Protection of St. George. But this is certain, that great Prince's Design was to engage the present and future Knights to distinguish themselves by their Courage and Virtue. This of all the like Orders has best adhered to the Rules of its Institution. More antient than those of the Golden-Fleece (7), and Holy Ghost (8), it has never degenerated as to the Number, which has all along been twenty six, including the Sovereign of the Order, who is always the Person that wears the Crown of England. The Kings and other Sovereign Princes, who have been, and still are, desirous of being admitted into this most noble

(1) The Charter-House. The Lord Walter Manny, considering the great danger of burying in the Church-yards, during this great Plague, purchased a Piece of Ground called Spittle-Croft, then belonging to the Master and Brethren of St. Bartholomew-Spittle, containing thirteen Acres and a Rod, without the Bars of Smithfield, and caused it to be inclosed and consecrated. In this place were buried above fifty thousand Persons that died of the Plague. In memory whereof, the said Lord, in 1171, built a Chapel on the same Ground, and founded a House for Charter-House, or Cistercian Monks. Stow's Ann. p. 246.

(2) Frezzart says, that the Governor let them in at a Postern, the very night King Edward came to Calais; and having received the twenty thousand Crowns from them, carried them into the great Tower of the Castle to take possession of it; but King Edward, who was in the same Tower, rushed up a Ladder, and took them Prisoners. c. 153.

(6) Mr. Alphons fixes the Institution of this noble and honorable Order, on the 23d of April, 1349, p. 185. But Dr. Brady justly doubts, whether it was instituted this Year, because the Plague at that time raged terribly at London, and other Parts adjacent. See H.B. p. 247. and Stow's Ann. p. 245, 246.

(7) An Order of Knighthood, instituted by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, at his Marriage with Isabelle of Portugal in 1429. The Order was at first composed of four and twenty Knights, who were Gentlemen of Birth, and unblemish'd Reputation. This Order is now common to all the Princes of the House of Astoria, as being descended from Mary of Burgundy, Daughter of Charles the Hardy, last Duke of Burgundy. Chiffet Favre.

(8) This is an Order of Knighthood in France, instituted by King Henry III. who celebrated his first Festival on the 23d of December, 1578. The Number of Knights was limited to a hundred, without including those of the Clergy, viz. Four Cardinals, and four Bishops, together with the great Almoner, and the Officer of the Order, viz. A Chancellor, Treasurer, Register, and King at Arms, and entered the Knights to wear a Cross of Malta, having a Dove in the Center of it. To which King Henry IV. in 1598, added, a Collar made of Tropheys, from whence proceed Flames, surmounted with crown'd Heads.

1349. Order, are a clear Evidence of its great Repute throughout all Europe (1).

However glorious Edward had hitherto been, he disdained not to hazard his Reputation, in an Affair which seemed below his notice. But the greatness of his Courage would not suffer him to weigh too nicely such sort of Considerations. The Merchants complaining of certain Spanish Ships infesting the Coasts of England, and doing them much Damage, he promised to clear the Seas of them. To that end, assembling such of his Ships as were soonest ready, he would go himself and give chase to the Corsairs. He fought and defeated them (2), took twenty of their Ships, sunk many more, and dispersed the rest. This Action, though in it self of little Importance, seemed to him so glorious, that he caused a Gold Coin to be struck, whereon he was represented in a Ship with his Cutlars in his Hand, in order to perpetuate the Memory thereof (3).

1350. Philip de Valois lived not to see the end of the Truce made with Edward. He died the 22d of August 1350, leaving for Successor his Son John, who renewed the Truce till Whitsontide 1354. But it was ill observed on both Sides. In Bretagne, Gascogne, Picardy, frequent Hostilities were committed, which occasioned mutual Complaints and even Reprisals, each Party throwing the Blame on his Enemy. The Earl of Derby, honoured with the Title of Duke of Lancaster (5), was sent to Calais with an Army, as if it had been open War. He made Inroads into the French Territories, and ravaged the Country from Calais to Troune. The greatest Advantage Edward reaped by the Non-observance of the Truce, was the Acquisition of the Town of Guines fold him by the Governor. When King John complained of it, Edward replied, that his Father Philip, by attempting to purchase Calais, had taught the English Commanders that Buying and Selling was no Breach of a Truce (5).

This Advantage however did not balance the Loss sustained by Edward in Flanders, by the entire Defection of the Flemings. Hitherto they had been his Friends, but for some time past, the Face of Affairs was entirely changed in that Country. After the Death of the Earl of Flanders, slain at the Battle of Cressy, the Flemings sent Deputies to Philip de Valois, to demand the Son of their deceased Sovereign, under Colour of putting him in possession of his Father's Inheritance. Philip consenting to their Request, when they had the young Prince in their Power, they contracted him to one of Edward's Daughters. This Accident would doubtless have been very prejudicial to Philip, if the Earl himself had not freed him from this. The young Prince, who by Education was wholly attached to the Interests of France, not bearing the Thoughts of marrying into the Family of his Sovereign's Enemy, privately withdrew from his Subjects, and cast himself again into his Arms. From thenceforward the Flemings began by degrees to be disengaged from the Interests of England. They even approved of the Marriage concluded by Philip between their Earl and the Duke of Brabant's Daughter, who had entirely forsaken Edward (6). Their Levity was the Cause that the Staple (7) of the English Wool, set up in their Country, was removed into England, to their great Damage, but to the Benefit of the English (8).

The new King of France seemed to be extremely desirous that the Truce might be changed into a firm and lasting Peace, to which Edward was not averse. In the Negotiations on this occasion, John offered to resign to the King of England, Guienne, with the Earldoms of Artois and Gaiquet, to hold them in full Sovereignty, without Homage to the Crown of France (9). But presently after, to his own, as well as to his Kingdom's Misfortune, he abruptly broke off the Negotiation, which ended only in prolonging the Truce till April the next Year.

It was not difficult to perceive that the King of France fought only to gain time, to enable himself the better to maintain the War. Edward was very sensible of it; but had himself need of some respite, in order to settle some domestic Affairs of Importance. The Obstinacy of the Scots in support of their King, though a Prisoner, fully convinced him, it would not be easy to reduce Scotland, as long as he was at War with France. This Consideration inclined him to patch up a Peace with the Scots, in expectation of a more favorable Opportunity to renew the War. But this Peace could not be made without their King's Release, so firmly did they insist upon that Article. To settle this Affair, Edward appointed Commissioners (10) to treat with the Scots, concerning King David's Liberty. This Negotiation, which was prolonged for some time, ended at length in a Treaty concluded at Newcastle, July the 13th, 1354, whereby Edward promised to free David for a Ransom of ninety thousand Marks of Silver. This Treaty was ratified a little after by the Prince of Wales his Son, but was not executed for Reasons mentioned hereafter. So David continued a Prisoner till 1357 (11).

When this Treaty was concluded, Edward considering from henceforth the Affairs of Scotland as of little moment, applied himself chiefly to those of France. The Truce being about to expire, he invited the Prince of Wales his Son with the Dutchy of Guienne; and sending him thither, commanded him to renew the Hostilities (12). Some affirm, King John had now invested the Dauphin, Charles his Son with that Dutchy, and thereby occasioned a Rupture. But there is no mention of this Circumstance either in the French Histories, or in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Besides, it is certain the War was not renewed till after the Expiration of the Truce. Whilst the Prince of Wales was preparing to renew the War in Guienne, the King his Father landing at Calais (13), routed Boulonnais and Artois without opposition. Upon this News, the King of France speedily assembled his Forces. At the same time, he sent Edward a Defiance, offering to fight him alone, or at the Head of their Armies: At least, this is what the French Historians affirm; adding, that Edward declined it, and knowing John was approaching to give him Battle, retired into England. The English, on the contrary, maintain the Defiance was sent by Edward, and refused by John. The wonder is, that the Collection of the Publick Acts, makes no mention of this Expedition of Edward, though

The Flemings followed by Edward.

At the same time also the Lord Ralph Stifford was created Earl of Stafford, with a Pension of one thousand Marks, till the King could provide Lands of that value to settle on him. Knighton. Cal. 260. Walf. p. 170.

What were the Staple Commodities of this Realm may be seen in the Statute of 14 Richard II. c. 1. as Wool, Leather, Woolfells, Lead, Tin, &c. The Staple of Wool was removed to Wymsinger, Canterbury, Chichester, Bristol, Lincoln and Hull; and Calais. See Rymer's Fed. Tom. 4. p. 613. Walf. p. 170.

(8) This was done by the Authority of the Parliament, which met this Year on Sept. 23. and continued, for some time longer, the Subsidy of Wool, Leather, and Woolfells, granted to the King in some of the late Parliaments. Parl. 27 Edw. III. N. 1.----- whenever the Kings of England went beyond Sea, a Memorandum of the day, both of their departure and return, is hardly ever omitted. But since the Historians of both Nations speak of Edward's going to Galais, a bare negative Proof is not sufficient to invalidate their Testimony. However, if Edward returned so hastily, it is certain, that very important Reasons called him home. The Scots having taken Berwick by Surprise, it was very dangerous to leave in their Hands a Place of that Importance, which gave them at all times an Inlet into England. To retake this Town was the occasion of Edward's hastening his return (1).

Immediately after his Arrival he called a Parliament (2), complaining of the Treachery of the Scots, who, after a Treaty concluded and ratified, abused his good Faith, by the Seductions of the King of France. The Parliament knowing the Necessity of recovering Berwick, and the King's want of Money to continue the War with France, granted him fifty shillings upon every Sack of Wool (3) sold in the Kingdom. It is said, this Subsidy amounted to more than three hundred and fifty thousand Marks a Year, so considerable was the Woollen Trade in those Days. With this Aid the King quickly raised an Army, at the Head of which he advanced to the Borders of Scotland. Upon his Approach, the Scots quitted Berwick (4), after demolishing the Fortifications, which he revenge by ravaging their Country (5). The unexpected Rupture of the Scots surprized him the more, as he had just made a Treaty with them, for releasing their King, and only raised for the payment of the Ransom agreed upon. This Proceeding of theirs quite altered the King's mind as to Peace, and caused him to take a new Resolution, with respect to the Affairs of Scotland (6).

After Bahis's Expulsion, he still kept the Title of King, but without any real Power, and in so servile a Dependence on the King of England, that he was looked upon only as a Subject. It is true, Edward left him the Command of his Troops, but they were so very few, that he was never able to make any Progress. So he spent his Days in a melancholy manner, with a Pension of six Marks a Day, allowed him by Edward, and some Presents for his extraordinary Expenses. There are manifest Proofs of his great Dependence in the Collection of the Publick Acts, particularly in the frequent Pardons for hunting in Edward's Forests. He was therefore but the Shadow of a King, made use of hitherto by Edward to compass his Ends. It was needless for the King to wear the Mask any longer, all his Proceedings plainly showing, he had been labouring more for himself than for Bahis. Laying aside therefore the Scruples by which he had till then been restrained, or rather throwing off the Cloak under which he had concealed his Intentions, he caused that Prince to resign all his Right to Scotland (7) for the yearly Pension of two thousand Pounds Sterling; a poor Recompence for a Crown, had it not been an imaginary Crown, which Bahis was very willing to part with. This Resignation proved fatal to King David. He had thereby the Mortification to see himself more closely confined, and to lose withal the hopes he had conceived of recovering his Liberty (8).

Charles de Blois Prisoner in England, since the Battle of the Rabe de Rien, was more fortunate than the King of Scotland, at least with regard to his Liberty, though it was purchased at a very dear rate. He artickled with Edward to pay seven hundred thousand Crowns for his Ransom, and left his two Sons in Hostage for Security of Payment (9).

Whilst Edward was employed at home, the Prince of Wales ravaged the southern Provinces of France, and particularly Languedoc. He made into that Province a sudden Irruption, which rendered him Master of Carcassonne and Narbonne, where he met with a very great Booty, and then returned to Bordeaux. By his retreat, the Measures to oppose his Invasion being neglected, he thought he might safely venture upon a second. As soon as his Troops were a little refreshed, he marched again (10) at the head of twelve thousand Men, of whom not above three thousand were Natives of England. He traversed le Prigord and le Limousin, entered Berry, and appeared before the Gates of Bourges. But the News of the King of France's approach, with sixty thousand Men, prevented his besieging that Place, and even obliged him to take a Compas, in order to retire to Bordeaux. But John, foreseeing his design, marched with such Expedition, that he overtook him near Poitiers. It being impossible for the Prince to retreat, he resolved to intrench himself at Maupey, in a Post incumbered with Vines and Hedges, and of a very difficult Access. Two Legates sent by the Pope to the two Princes, to persuade them to Peace, used their utmost Endeavours to prevent an Engagement. They even induced the Prince of Wales to promise to repair all the Damage done in his Incursion, and engage not to bear Arms against France for seven Years. John's Superiority causing him to reject these Offers, he expected the Prince with his whole Army should surrender at discretion (11). This Condition not being relished by the Prince, he generously replied, he had rather dye Sword in Hand, than be guilty of a thing contrary to his Honour, and the Glory of the English Name.

All hopes of Agreement vanishing, the Prince of Wales made a short Speech to his Troops, telling them, "That Victory depended not on Numbers, but on Bravery: "That for his own part, he was resolved to conquer or dye, and would not expose his Country to the disgrace of paying his Ransom." All King John's Generals unanimously advised him to starve this little Army, cooped up in the middle of an Enemy's Country, where they would quickly be in want of all Things. This Advice appeared to him too wary and inconsistent with his Impatience. He fancied, they would rob him of the transcendent Glory, he hoped to acquire by the Defeat of so renowned a Prince, to feed him with the imaginary Honour of conquering without fighting. So, full of the pleasing Expectation of obtaining an easy Victory, and revenging his Subjects, he resolved without delay to attack the Enemies. He committed at first a very great Error; in causing his Horse to dismount and begin the Fight. The Horse, unaccustomed to charge on foot, were not able to break through the English, who had the Advantage of the Ground, in a Country full of Hedges, through which there was a necessity to pass, in order to force their Intrenchments. The dismounted Cavalry being repulsed with great loss, the Infantry supplied their Place, and met the same Resistance; notwithstanding the King's Efforts, who maintained the Fight four Hours, incouraging his Troops by his Voice and Example, without fearing to expose his Person to the greatest Dangers. What Efforts soever he made, it was not possible for him to rout this handful of English, whom the necessity of conquering, caused to fight desperately; being moreover animated by the Example of the Prince, who performed that day Acts of Wisdom and Valour, comparable to those of the most renowned Generals. Of four Sons, the King of France had with him; the three eldest retiring betimes, with eight hundred Lances, their Retreat did not a little contribute to discourage the rest of the Army. Mean time, King John acted by despair, signalized himself in all the most dangerous Places, and drew upon him the bravest of his Enemies. Though he saw himself forsaken, he inspired the boldest with Terror. But, in all appearance, he would at length have sunk under the Multitude of the Enemies that surrounded him, and left him no hopes of saving his Life, if Denis de Morbeck, a Knight of Artois, dispersing those who pressed him the most vigorously, had not earnestly persuaded him to yield himself Prisoner. He would have been very glad to deliver his Sword to the Prince of Wales, but as the Prince was too remote, he was forced to surrender himself to Monbeck with Philip his fourth Son, about thirteen Years old, who had all along fought by his Side. In this unfortunate Day, so fatal to France, there were not above six thousand Men slain, but among that Number were eight hundred Nobles, the Duke of Burbon a Prince of the Blood, the Duke of Athens, Constable of France, the Marshal de Negre, and above fifty other great Lords of the Kingdom.

If the victorious Prince distinguished himself by his Conduct and Bravery in this glorious Day, he was no less admired after his Victory, for his modest and generous Behaviour to his Prisoner. The Evening after the 1356. Battle, the King supping in the Prince of Wales's Tent, pressed him to sit at Table with him; but he very civilly declining it, stood and talked with him all the while. As the King, whose Thoughts were still employed with his unfortunate Condition, was complaining of his Fate, the Prince said to him, in a free, though modest and unadorned manner, "That he had one great Reason to be comforted, that the Battle was not lost by his fault: That the English had found to their Cost, he was the bravest of Princes; but that God alone had disposed of the Victory. And, (continued he) if your ill Fortune has thrown you into your present Disgrace, you may at least rest assured, that an inviolable Regard shall be preserved for your Person; and you shall find in me a very respectful Relation, if I may be allowed to glory in that Title." So great a Modesty in a young victorious Prince, little more than five and twenty Years of Age, melted the King into Tears, and filled the Hearers with Admiration. As soon as John had recovered himself, he turned to the Prince, and said to him, with an Air of Satisfaction, "That since it was his Destiny to be vanquished and taken, it was a great Comfort in his Misfortune, that he had not behaved himself unworthily; and was fallen into the Hands of so valiant and generous a Prince." On the morrow, solemn Thanks were returned to God, in the English Camp, for this great Victory. The Prince thanked his victorious Troops with such Expressions, as ascribed to them the Honour of the Day, without the least mention of himself. Then he marched for Bourdeaux, laden with an inestimable Booty, and so great a Number of Prisoners, that it would have been difficult for the English to defend themselves, in case they had been attacked (1).

It is easy to conceive, the Joy this News spread over all England, and how great Edward's Satisfaction was in particular: God's Protection of the Prince of Wales being too visible to be disregarded, the King ordered publick Thanksgiving for this signal Victory, to be returned to God for eight Days together, in all the Churches of the Kingdom. The Prince of Wales spent the Winter at Bourdeaux, where two Legates from the Pope came, and pressed him so earnestly, that he consented, with the Approbation of the King his Father, to a Truce for two Years, wherein all the Allies of both Crowns were included. In April following (2) he came into England, bringing his Prisoner with him. He was received there with excessive Joy, but constantly refused all the Honours that were offered him, being satisfied with those paid to the captive King. When they made their Entry into London, the Prince of Wales rode on a little black Nag, the King of France's Horse, who was mounted on a stately white Courser, adorned with costly Trappings. One would have thought that all the Pomp (3) displayed on this occasion, was intended purely to do Honour to the captive King; so great care was taken to avoid all signs of his Disgrace, and every thing that might be offensive to his Eyes. Though Edward disputed with him the Title of King of France, he treated him however like a King. The Sight of the captive Prince putting him in mind of the Infatigability of human Grandeur, he received him with as-cordial Embraces, as if he had been his own Brother, or was come on purpose to pay him a Visit. In this noble and generous manner, the Father and Son strove with Emulation to comfort the unfortunate King, by all the Marks of Respect due to a great Prince, in whatever State Fortune may have placed him. It is reported, when Edward received the News of the Victory of Poitiers, he said to those about him, that his Satisfaction at so glorious a Success, was not comparable to the Pleasure caused by the generous Behaviour of the Prince. King John and Prince Philip his Son were lodged together in the Palace of the Savoy (4), with all the honorable Freedom they could desire. The other captive Lords met with the same Treatment and Civilities.

Edward enjoyed then a so much greater Glory, as it was very uncommon, I mean, of having Prisoners his two most potent Enemies; the King of France at London, and the King of Scotland at Orléans [in Hanfjil i.]. King David should have had his Liberty long since, pursuant to the Articles agreed upon three Years before; but for the Reasons above mentioned, saw himself still detained in Captivity. However, when he had least Cause to expect any Favour from a victorious Enemy, who had just reduced Scotland to an irretrievable State, Edward was moved by the pressing Instances of the Queen his Sister, and agreed to renew the Treaty of 1354. To that end he granted Safe-conducts to Ambassadors from Scotland, who, during a short Truce, obtained their King's Liberty, upon much the same Terms as in the first Treaty. They engaged to pay for his Ransom a hundred thousand Marks Sterling; namely, ten thousand every Year till the whole was paid; and for Security, the King of Scotland gave twenty Hostages. At the same time, a ten Years Truce was concluded between England and Scotland. David was released (5) upon these Conditions, which he took care to ratify as soon as he came into his Kingdom, after an eleven Years Captivity. It seems that Edward, wholly taken up then with his vast Projects against France, had lost all Thoughts of becoming master of Scotland. At least he believed it best to defer the Execution of that Design, till a more convenient Season.

Edward's late Truces with France and Scotland, having freed him from the trouble of foreign Affairs, he confined his Thoughts to the Government of his Kingdom. But as nothing extraordinary passed, he spent part of his time in Divisions, of which the King of France and the other chief Prisoners always partook. The Tournament he held at Windsor on the 23d of April, 1358, to solemnize the Feast of St. George, Patron of the Order of the Garter, was the most sumptuous and magnificent that had ever been seen in England. The Duke of Brabant, with several other sovereign Princes, and an infinite Number of Knights of all Nations were present, and splendidly entertained.

This Diversion was followed by the Funeral of Queen Isabella, the King's Mother. She died at the Castle of Rufford, aged sixty three Years, after a twenty eight Years Confinement (6). If the Marriage of this Queen was fatal to the King her Husband, it was no less so to France, since it proved the occasion of a long and bloody War, which brought that Kingdom to the very Brink of Destruction.

Goffrey d'Harcourt, of whom I have spoken on occasion, of the King's Defeat at la Hogue, and who served the King of Navarre in Normandy, was there slain about this Time (7). As he had by Will made the King of England his sole Heir, and as his Lands were in the Demesnes of the King of Navarre in Normandy, Edward took possession, and gave them to the Lord of Holland.

Whilst England enjoyed a profound Tranquillity, France was in extreme Desolation, by the intestine Troubles caused by the King's Imprisonment. Charles the Dauphin, John's eldest Son, held the Reins of the Government, by the Title of Lieutenant-General, afterwards changed into that of Regent. His Regency was so disturbed by the Cabals of some restless Men, who found their Advantage in the Confusion of Affairs, that it was not possible to think effectually of freeing their King. The Affairs of France were then in a deplorable Situation. Charles the Bald, King of Navarre, though sprung from the Family Royal of France (8), raised daily Commotions and Tumults in Paris, where he had a powerful Party (9). The Authority of the Dauphin was thereby so restrained, that, though a Prince of

TREATY of BRÉTIGNY.

Edward, eldest Son to the King of France and England, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester; To all those who shall see these Letters, Greeting: We make you know, That after all the Debates and Disorders whatsoever, moved or stirred between our Lord and Father, King of France and England, on the one Part; and our Cousins the King, his eldest Son, Regent of the Realm of France, and all those it may concern on the other Part, for the Good of Peace, it is agreed, the eighth Day of May, 1360, at Bretigny near Chartres, in the manner following:

"I. THAT the King of England, with what he holds in Gasconne and Guyenne, shall have for him, and his Heirs for ever, all those things which follow, to hold them in the same manner the King of France, or his Son, or any of his Ancestors, Kings of France, held them: That is to say, those in Sovereignty in Sovereignty, and those in Demain in Demain, according to the time and manner hereafter declared. The City, Castle, and Earldom of Poitiers, with the whole Land and Country of Poitou; together with the Fief of Thouars, and Land of Belleville; the City and Castle at Xaintes, and the whole Land of Xaintonge, on this side, and beyond the River of Charente; the City and Castle of Agen, and the Land and Country of Agenois; the City and Castle, and whole Earldom of Perigot, and the Land and Country of Perigoux; the City, Castle, and whole Earldom of Limoges, the Land and Country of Limosin; the City and Castle of Cahors, and the Land and Country of Cahorsin; the City, and Castle, and Country of Tarbes, and the Land, Country and Earldom of Bigorre; the Earldom, Land, and Country of Gaurie; the City and Castle of Angoulême, and the Earldom, Land, and Country of Angoulême; the City and Castle of Rodez; the Land and Country of Rouergue. And if there be any Lords, as the Earl of Fais, the Earl of Armagnac, the Earl of Lisle, the Earl of Perigot, and Viscount of Limoges, or others, which hold any Lands within the Bounds of these places, they shall do Homage to the King of England, and all other Services and Devoirs due by reason of their Lands, in the same manner they did in times past (1).

"II. Also the King of England shall have all that any of the Kings of England antiently held in the Town of Montreuil upon the Sea, with their Appurtenances.

"III. Also the King of England shall have all the County or Earldom of Ponthieu entirely; save and except, that if any thing of the said County or Appurtenances have been alienated by the Kings of England for the time being, and to other Persons than the Kings of France, the King of France shall not be obliged to render them to the King of England: And if the said Alienations have been made to the Kings of France for the time being, without mean, and he doth possess them at present, they are entirely to be released to the King of England; except the Kings of France had them by exchange for other Lands of the Kings of England, than both were to release. But if the Kings of England for the time being, had alienated any thing to other Persons than to the King of France, and afterwards they came into his Hands, he shall not be obliged to render them: Also if the things aforesaid owe Homage, the King of France shall convey them to others, who shall do it for the King of England: And if they do not owe Homage, the King of France shall appoint a Trustee or Tenant to perform the Devoir, within one Year after he shall depart from Calais.

"IV. Also the King of England shall have the Castle and Town of Calais; the Castle, Town, and Seigneurie of Merk; the Towns, Castles, and Lordships of Senegre, Colongue, Luray, Hale and Oye, with Lands, Woods, Marshes, Rivers, Rents, Lordships, or Seigneuries, Advowsons of Churches, and all other Appurtenances lying between the Meles and Ponds following; that is to say, from Calais by the Course of the River that goes before Craville, and also by the Course of the same River round about Longle, and by the River which goes beyond the Pel, and by the same River that falls into the great Lake of Guisnes, and so to Fretun, and from thence by the Valley about the Hill Calcuty, inclosing that Hill, and so to the Sea, with Sangate and all the Appurtenances.

"V. Also the King of England shall have the Castle, Town, and County, or Earldom of Guisnes, with all the Lands, Towns, Castles, Fortresses, Places, Men, Homages, Lordships, Woods, Forests, and the Rights of them, as entirely as the Earl of Guisnes, lately dead, had them at the time of his Death; and the Churches and good People being within the Limits of the County of Guisnes, of Calais, and Merk, and other places aforesaid, shall obey the King of England, as they obeyed the King of France, or Earl of Guisnes for the time being; all which things of Merk and Calais, contained in this and the precedent Article, the King of England shall hold in Demain, except the Heritages of the Churches, which shall remain to them entirely wherever they be; and also except the Heritages of other People, of the Country of Merk and Calais, lying out of the Town of Calais, to the value of a hundred Livres of yearly Rent, or under, of current Money of the Country, which shall remain to them. But the Heritages and Habitations being in the Town of Calais, with their Appurtenances, shall be to the King of England in Demain, to dispose of them at his pleasure; and also the Inhabitants in the County, Town, and Lands of Guisnes, shall enjoy all their Demains entirely, and shall wholly be returned to them, saving what hath been said concerning the Borders, Meets, and Bounds in the precedent Article.

"VI. Also it is agreed, the King of England and his Heirs shall have and hold all the Isles adjacent to the Lands, Countries, and Places before-named; together with all other Isles, which he holds at present.

"VII. Also it is agreed, the King of France, and his eldest Son the Regent, for them, their Heirs and Successors, as soon as they can without Deceit, and at furthest by the Feast of St. Michael, in one Year after the same Feast next coming, shall render, transfer, and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, all Honours, Obediences, Homages, Liegences, Vassals, Fees, Services, Recognitions, Rights, mere, and mixt Empire, and all manner of Jurisdiction, high and low, Reforts, Safeguard, Collations and Patronages of Churches, and all manner of Seigneuries, and Sovereignities, and all the Right they have, or can have, appertains, or can appertain to them, by what Cause, Title, or Colour of Right soever, or to the Kings and Crown of France, by reason of the Cities, Counties, Towns, Castles, Lands, Countries, Isles, and Places before-named, and all their Appurtenances and Dependances, and every one of them, wherever they are, without retaining any thing to them, or their Heirs and Successors, or to the Kings or Crown of France. And also, that the King, and his eldest Son, should send their Letters Patents to all the Archbishops, Bishops, and all other Prelates of Holy Church; and to the Earls, Viscounts, Barons, Noblemen, Citizens, and others of the Cities, Lands, Countries, Isles and Places before-named, that they should obey the King of England and his Heirs, and their certain Command, in the same manner they had obeyed the Kings and Crown of France; and by the same Letters they should quit and absolve them after the best manner they could, from all Faiths, Homages, Oaths, Obligations, Subjections and Promises made by any of them, to the Kings and Crown of France, in what manner soever (2).

(1) The first Article was corrected; and instead of the Words, (those in Sovereignty in Sovereignty) were inserted the words, (those in Fee in Fee.)
(2) This Article was corrected; the Word (Reforts) being left out in the corrected Copy, and these Words or Sentence (and all manner of Seigneuries and Sovereignities) and these Words or Sentence (without retaining any thing to them or their Heirs and Successors, or to the Kings or Crown of France) and the last Words (in what manner soever.)

"VIII. Also it is agreed, That the King of England shall have the Cities, Counties, Castles, Lands, Countries, Isles, and Places before-named, with all their Appurtenances and Dependences, wherever they are; to hold to him, his Heirs and Successors, heritably and perpetually in Demain, as the Kings of France held them, and in the same manner, saving what hath been said above, in the Article of Calais and Mark; and also the Cities, Castles, Counties, Lands, Counties, Isles, and Places before-named, Rights, mere and mixt Empire, Jurisdiction and Profits whatever, which any Kings of England held there, with their Appurtenances and Dependences; any Alienations, Donations, Obligations, or Incumbrances, had, or done by any of the Kings of France, in seventy Years from that time, by whatsoever Cause or Form it was; all such Alienations, Donations, Obligations or Incumbrances, are now, and shall be wholly annulled, repealed, and made void: And all things so given, alienated, or incumbered, shall be really rendered and delivered to the King of England entirely, and in the same Condition they were seventy Years since, or to his special Deputies, as soon as they may without fraud; and at furtherest, before Michaelmas next come twelvemonths, to hold them heritably and perpetually, and to his Heirs and Successors; except what is said in the Article of Ponthieu, which is to remain in its force; and saving all things given and alienated to Churches, which shall peaceably remain to them in all Countries before and after-named, so as the Parsons of the Churches pray diligently for the Kings as for their Founders, wherewith their Consciences shall be charged.

"IX. Also it is agreed, The King of England shall have and hold all the Cities, Counties, Castles, and Countries above-named, which antiently the Kings of England had not, in the same Estate as the King of France, and his Sons hold them at present.

"X. Also it is agreed, That if within the Limits of the Countries the Kings of England antiently possessed, they should now have any thing that was not then theirs, of which the King of France was in possession, on the 19th of September, 1356, they shall be and remain to the King of England, and his Heirs as above-said.

"XI. Also it is agreed, That the King of France and his eldest Son the Regent, for them and their Heirs, and for the Kings of France and their Successors for ever, as soon as they could without deceit, and at furtherest before Michaelmas 1361, should render and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, and transfer to them all the Honours, Liegences, Obediences, Homages, Vassals, Fees, Services, Recognizances, Oaths, Right, mere and mixt Empire, all manner of Jurisdiccions high and low, Reforts, Safeguards, and Seigneuries, which can, or may belong in any manner to the Kings or Crown of France, or to any other Person, by reason of the King, or Crown of France, at any time, in the Cities, Counties, Castles, Lands, Countries, Isles, and Places above-named, or in any of them, their Appurtenances and Appendances whatsoever, or in Persons, Vassals, Subjects, or whosoever of them, be they Princes, Dukes, Earls, Viscounts, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates of the Church, Barons, Noblemen, and others whosoever, without reserving or retaining any thing to them, their Heirs and Successors, or to the Crown of France or others, whatever it be, whereby they, their Heirs, and Successors, or any Kings of France, or other Person, under pretence of the King and Crown of France, may challenge, and demand any thing in time to come, from the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, or upon any of the Vassals and Places: Also all the reason of those Countries and Successors, shall before-named Persons, their Heirs and Subjects of the King for ever be the Liegemen and Subjects of the King of England, his Heirs and Successors; and that he and they shall hold all the Persons, Cities, Counties, Castles, Fortresses, Isles, Castles, and Places aforesaid, named, and all their Appurtenances and Appendances, and they shall be and remain to them fully, perpetually, freely, in their Seigneury, Sovereignty, Obedience, Liegeance, and Subjection, as the Kings of France had and held them in any time past; and and that the said King of England, his Heirs, Successors, shall have and hold perpetually all the Countries before-named, with their Appurtenances and Appendances, and other things before-named, with all perpetual Franchises and Liberties, as Sovereign and Liege Lord, as Neighbour to the King and Realm of France, without acknowledging any Sovereign, or performance of any Obedience, Homage, Refort, Subjection, and without doing in any time to come any Service, or making Recognizance to the King or Crown of France, for the Cities, Counties, Castles, Lands, Countries, Isles, Places, and Persons before-named, or for any of them (1).

"Also, it is agreed, That the King of France, and his eldest Son the Regent, for them, and their Heirs, and for the Kings of France, and their Successors for ever, as soon as they can without fraud, and at furtherest before Michaelmas 1361, shall render and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, and transfer to them, all the Honours, Liegences, Obediences, Homages, Vassals, Fees, Services, Recognizances, Oaths, Right, mere and mixt Empire, all manner of Jurisdiccions high and low, Safeguards and Seigneuries, which can or may belong in any manner, to the Kings or Crown of France, (ou a aucun autre person a cause du Roy & de la Couronne de France,) at any time in the Cities, Counties, Castles, Lands, Countreys, Isles, and Places above-named, or in any of them, their Appurtenances, and Appendances, whatsoever, or in Persons, Vassals, Subjects, or whosoever of them.

"XII. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France and his eldest Son, shall renounce expressly all Reforts and Sovereignities, and all the Right they have or can have in all those things, which by this Treaty ought to belong to the King of England. And in like manner, he and his eldest Son shall renounce, expressly all those things, which by this Treaty ought not to be long or be delivered to him, and all Demands he makes of the King of France, and especially to the Name, and to the Right of the Crown of the Kingdom of France, and to the Homages, Sovereignty, and Demain of the Duchy of Normandy, the Duchy of Tourain, the Counties of Anjou and Main, the Sovereignty and Homage of the Dukedom of Bretagne, and the Homages and Sovereignities of the Country and County of Flanders, and all other Demands, he can or shall make of the King of France, for what Cause soever, except what by this Treaty ought to remain, and be delivered to the King of England and his Heirs; and one King shall part with, release and transfer to the other perpetually all the Right which either of them hath, or can have, in all the things which by this Treaty ought to remain, and be delivered to each of them; and of the time and place where and when the said Renunciations shall be made, the two Kings shall agree and appoint when they meet at Calais (2).

"XIII. Also, it is agreed, That to the end this Treaty may speedily be accomplished, that the King of England, shall bring the King of France to Calais, within three Weeks after Midsummer, (there being no just hindrance) at his own Expence.

"XIV. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France shall pay to the King of England, three Millions of Crowns of Gold, whereof two shall be of the value of a Noble of English Money; whereof six hundred thousand Crowns shall be paid to him or his Deputies, within four Months after the King of France shall arrive at Calais, and within a Year following, four hundred thousand Crowns to be paid at London, and so every Year four hundred thousand Crowns to be paid there until the whole was discharged.

"XV. It is also agreed, That for the Payment of the six hundred thousand Crowns at Calais, and for the delivery of the Hostages hereafter named, within four Months after the King of France shall be come to Calais, the Town, Castle, and Fortresses of Rochelle, the Castles, Fortresses, and Towns of the County of Guines, shall be rendered to the King of England, with all their Appurtenances, and Appendances; and the Person of the King of France shall be delivered out of " Prison, but he is not to arm himself or People against " the King of England, but is to accomplish what was " to be done by this Treaty; and the Hostages were the " great Prisoners taken at the Battle of Poitiers, and

" these following:

" That is to say, Monsieur Lewis Earl of Anjou, Mon" sieur John Earl of Poitiers, the King's Sons, the Duke
" of Orleans the King's Brother, the Duke of Bourbon,
" the Earl of Blois, or his Brother, the Earl of St. Paul,
" the Earl of Arles, or Monsieur Peter of Arles his " Brother, the Earl of Harcourt, the Earl of Poitiers,
" the Earl of Valentinois, the Earl of Brienne, the Earl " of Vendôme, the Earl of Forcé, the Viscount Beau" mont, the Lord of Courcy, the Lord of Fienne, the " Lord of Proux, the Lord of St. Venant, the Lord of " Guenecieres, the Dauphin of Auvergne, the Lord of " Harzay, the Lord of Montmorency, Monsieur William
" de Craon, Monsieur Lewis of Harcourt, Monsieur
" John de Ligny. The Names of the Prisoners taken at " Poitiers were these:

" Monsieur Philip of France, the Earl of Eu, the " Earl of Langueville, the Earl of Penthièvre, the Earl of " Joigny, the Earl of Saucerre, the Earl of Dammarin,
" the Earl of Ventadour, the Earl of Salbruche, the Earl " of Auxerre, the Earl of Vendôme, the Earl of Craon,
" the Lord of Darnall, or Rual, the Marthal of Dan" chan, or d'Andenham, the Lord of Aubigny.

" XVI. Also, it is agreed, That the Prisoners afore" said, which come to remain in Hostage for the King
" of France, shall therefore be delivered out of Prison,
" without paying any Ransom, according to Agreement " made before the third of May last past; and if any " of them be out of England, and not in Hostage at " Calais, within the first Month after the said three " Weeks, after Midsummer, without just hindrance, he " shall not be quit of his Imprisonment, but be forced " by the King of France to return into England, and
" there remain Prisoner, or pay the Penalty by him
" promised and incurred, for not returning.

" XVII. Also, it is agreed, That instead of those " Hostages, which shall not come to Calais, or shall " dye, or shall remove out of the Power of the King of " England, the King of France shall deliver others of " the same Quality, as soon as may be, within four " Months after the Bayly of Amiens, and the Major of " St. Omer, upon the King of England's Certificate, " shall have notice thereof; and the King of France,
" upon his departure from Calais, may have in his " Company ten of the Hostages, such as the two Kings
" shall agree upon, so as thirty may remain.

" XVIII. Also, it is agreed, That the King of " France, within three Months after he shall be gone
" from Calais, shall send thither, to remain in Hostage, " four Persons of the Town of Paris, and two of every " Town following, of St. Omer, Arras, Amiens, Beau" vais, Lifle, Daway, Tournay, Reims, Châlons, Troyes, " Charvais, Tholouse, Lyon, Orleans, Compiègne, Rouen, " Caen, Tours, Bourges; The most sufficient of these " Towns for the Accomplishment of this Treaty.

" XIX. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France
" shall be brought from England to Calais, and re" main there for four Months, but shall pay nothing
" the first Month for his Guard and Keeping; but " for every one of the other Months he shall remain
" there, he shall pay six thousand Royals, as they shall " be then current in France, before his departure from " Calais, and so afterwards for the time he stays there.

" XX. Also, it is agreed, That as soon as may be,
" within a Year after the King of France is departed " from Calais, Monsieur John Earl of Montfort, shall " have the Earldom of Montfort, with all its Apper" tenances, doing Homage Liege to the King of France, " and his Devoir and Service in every Case, as a good and " loyal Vassal Liege ought to do to his Liege Lord by " reason of his Earldom; and also his other Heritages " shall be rendered to him, that belong not to the " Duchy of Bretagne, doing Homage and other dues
" belonging to them; and if he will demand any thing
" in any of the Heritages belonging to that Duchy,
" out of the Country of Bretagne, he shall receive good
" and speedy reason from the Court of France.

" XXI. Also, upon the Question of the Demain of " Bretagne, which is between Monsieur John de Mont-
" fort, and Monsieur Charles de Blois, it is agreed, That " the two Kings calling before them or their Deputies,
" the Parties Principals, they shall inform themselves of " their Right, and shall endeavour to make them agree " about all that is in debate between them, as soon as " they can: And in case neither the Kings, or their " Deputies, can make an Agreement within a Year

" after the King of France shall arrive at Calais, Friends " on both Sides may make the best Agreement between " them they can, and as soon as they can, and if they " cannot compromise the Matter within half a Year,
" they shall make Report thereof, and what they find
" concerning the Rights of each Party, and why the De" bate remains between them, to the two Kings or their " Deputies, and then they as soon as may be, shall make " an Accord, giving their final Sentence upon the Right " of each Party, which shall be executed by the two " Kings; and in case they cannot end the Controversy
" in half a Year, then the two Principal Parties of Blois
" and Montfort shall do what seems best to them, and " the Friends of one Part and the other, shall assist
" which Part they please, without hindrance of the said
" Kings, or without receiving any Damage, Blame, or " Reproach from them; and if it happen that one of " the Parties will not appear before the Kings or their " Deputies, at the time appointed, and also in case the " Kings or their Deputies shall declare an Accord be" tween the Parties, and shall give their Opinion of the " Right of one Party; and either of the Parties will not " consent to, and obey the Declaration, then the said
" Kings shall be against him with their whole Power,
" and in Aid of the other which shall comply and obey;
" but the two Kings shall not in any Case in their pro" per Persons, or by others, make War upon one an" other for the Cause aforesaid, and the Sovereignty and " Homage of the Dutchy shall always remain to the " King of France.

" XXII. Also, That all the Lands, Towns, Coun" tries, Castles, and other Places delivered to the King, " shall enjoy such Liberties and Franchises as they have
" at present, which shall be confirmed by the said Kings
" or their Successors, so often as they shall be duly re" quired, if they be not contrary to this Accord.

" XXIII. Also, the King of France shall render, or " cause to be rendered, and confirm to Monsieur Philip " of Navarre, and to all his Adherents, after this time, as " soon as may be, without Deceit, and at furthest
" within a Year after the King of France shall be gone
" from Calais, all the Towns, Fortresses, Castles, Lord-
" ships, Rights, Rents, Profits, Jurisdictions, and Places
" whatever, which he is in his own Right, or in Right of " his Wife, or his Adherents, held or ought to hold in " the Kingdom of France: And that he shall not do " them any Damage or Injury, or reproach them for " any thing done before that time, and shall pardon
" them all Offences and Misprisions for the time past,
" by reason of the War; and for this they shall have " good and sufficient Letters, so as the said Monsieur
" Philip and his Adherents return to their Homage,
" and perform their Devoirs, and be good and loyal " Vassals.

" XXIV. Also, it is accorded, That the King of " England may give, for this time only, to whom he
" please the Lands and Heritages that were Monsieur
" Godfrey de Harcourt's, to hold of the Duke of Nor" mandy, or other Lords of whom they ought to hold,
" by Homage and Services anciently accustomed.

" XXV. Also, it is agreed, That any Man or " Country, under the Obedience of one Party, shall, by
" by reason of this Accord, go under the Obedience of " the other Party, he shall not be impeached for any " thing done in time past.

" XXVI. Also, it is agreed, That the Lands of the " Banished, and Adherents of one Party and the other,
" and the Churches of one Party and the other, and all " those that are disseised and outed of their Lands, or " charged with any Pension, Tax, or Imposition, or " otherwise in any manner charged by reason of the War,
" shall be restored entirely to the same Rights and Pos" sessions which they had before the War began; and " that all manner of Forfeitures, Trespasses, or Mispriso-" nions, done by them, or any of them in that time,
" shall be wholly pardoned; and these things to be done
" so soon as they will can, or at furthest within one " Year after the King shall leave Calais, except what is " said in the Article of Calais and Merck, and the other " Places named in that Article; except also the Viscount " of Fronsac, and Monsieur John Gailhard, who are not " to be comprised in this Article, but their Goods and " Heritages shall remain as they were before the Treaty.

" XXVII. Also,

" XXVII. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France shall deliver to the King of England, as soon as well he may, and at furthest within one Year after his Departure from Calais, all the Cities, Towns, Counties, and other Places above named, which by this Treaty ought to be delivered to him.

" XXVIII. Also, it is agreed, That upon delivery of the Towns, Fortresses, and whole County of Ponthieu; the Towns, Fortresses, and whole County of Montfort; the City and Castle of Xaintes; the Castles, Towns, Fortresses, and all the King held in Demain in the County of Xaintonge, on both Sides the River Charente; the City and Castle of Angoulême, and the Castles, Fortresses, and Towns which the King of France held in Demain in the Country of Angoulême, with Letters and Commands of releasing of Faith and Homage to the King of England, or his Deputies. He at his proper Cost and Charge shall deliver all the Fortresses taken and possessed by him, his Subjects, Adherents, and Allies, in the Countries of France, of Anjou, of Maine, of Berry, Auvergne, Burgundy, Champagne, Picardy, and Normandy, and in all other Parts and Lands of the Kingdom of France; except those in the Duchy of Bretagne, and those Countries and Lands by this Treaty which ought to be and remain to the King of England.

" XXIX. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France shall give up, and deliver to the King of England, his Heirs, or Deputies, all the Towns, Fortresses, Castles, and other Lands, Countries, and Places before named, with their Appertinences, at his proper Costs and Charge: And also if he shall have any Rebels, or Disobedient, that will not render and give up to the King of England any Cities, Castles, Towns, Countries, Places, or Fortresses, which ought to belong to him, the King of France shall be bound to cause them to be delivered at his own Expence: And likewise the King of England shall cause to be delivered at his Expence, the Fortresses that by this Treaty ought to belong to the King of France. And the said Kings, and their People, shall be bound to aid one another, when they shall be required, at the Wages of the Party that shall require it, which shall be one Florin of Florence a Day for a Knight, and half a Florin for an Esquire, and to others according to that rate. And for the Surplus of the double Wages it is agreed, That if the Wages be too small, in regard of the Rate of Provisions or Victuals in the Countries, they shall be ordered by four Knights chosen for that purpose, two of one Party, and two of the other.

" XXX. Also, it is agreed, That all the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates, and Men of Holy Church, by reason of their Temporalities, shall be subject to that King under whom they hold their Temporalities; and if they have Temporalities under both Kings, they shall be subject to each King for the Temporality they hold of him.

" XXXI. Also, it is agreed, That good Alliances, Amities, and Confederacies be made between both the Kings and their Kingdoms, saving the Conscience and Honour of one King and the other, notwithstanding any Confederacies they have made on this side, or beyond the Sea, with any Persons, be they of Scotland or Flanders, or any other Country.

" XXXII. Also, it is agreed, That the King of France, and his eldest Son the Regent, for them and for their Heirs Kings of France, as soon as it may be done, shall declare themselves, and depart from all the Confederacies they have with the Scots; and promise, that they nor their Heirs, nor the Kings of France for the time being, shall give or do to the King or Realm of Scotland, nor the Subjects thereof, present and to come, any Aid, Comfort, or Favour, against the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, nor against the Kingdom, nor against the Subjects in any manner; and that they make not other Alliances with the Scots in time to come, against the Kings and Kingdom of England. And in like manner, as soon as it may be done, the King of England and his eldest Son shall declare themselves, and depart from all Alliances they have with the Flemings; and promise that they nor their Heirs, nor the Kings of England for the time being, shall give or do to the Flemings present and to come, any Aid, Comfort, or Favour against the King of France, his Heirs and Successors, nor against his Kingdom, nor against his Subjects in any manner; 1360. and that they make no Alliances with the said Flemings in time to come, against the Kings and Kingdom of France.

" XXXIII. Also, it is agreed, That the Collations and Provisions made of Benefices, vacant in time of the War by one Party and the other, shall hold and be good; and that the Costs, Issues, and Revenues, received and levied of any Benefices, or other things, Temporal whatever, in the Kingdoms of France and England, by one Party or the other, during the Wars, shall be quitted by one Party and the other.

" XXXIV. Also, That the Kings above-said shall be bound to cause to be confirmed all the Things above-said by our Holy Father the Pope; and they shall be made sure, and strengthened by Oaths, Sentences, and Censures of the Court of Rome, and all other Places, in the most strong manner that can be; and there shall be obtained Dispensations, Absolutions, and Letters from the Court of Rome for perfecting this Treaty, and they shall be delivered to the Parties, at furthest within three Weeks after the King shall be arrived at Calais.

" XXXV. Also, That all the Subjects of the said Kings, which come to study in the Universities, and Places of Study in the Kingdoms of France and England, shall enjoy the Privileges and Liberties of those Places and Universities, as well as they might have done before the War, or as they do at this present.

" XXXVI. Also, it is agreed, That to the end the Things debated and treated of as above, may be more established, firm, and valuable, there shall be made and given the Securities which follow: That is to say, Letters (or Instruments) sealed with the Seals of both Kings and their eldest Sons, the best that can be made or directed by their Counsel. And the said Kings and their eldest Sons, and other Sons shall swear, and also those of their Lineage, and other great Men of their Kingdoms, to the Number of twenty on each side, That they will observe and keep, and help in the keeping of the things treated and agreed, inasmuch as shall concern them, and without Fraud or Deceit shall accomplish them, without ever doing any thing to the contrary, and without any hindrance of the same. And if there shall be any of the Kingdom of England or France, which shall be Rebels, and will not agree to the things above-said, the said Kings shall use the Power of their Bodies, Goods, and Friends, to bring such Rebels to Obedience, according to the Form and Tenour of the Treaty. And further, the said Kings, their Heirs, and Kingdoms, shall submit themselves to the Coercion of our Holy Father the Pope, that he may constrain by Sentences, Censures of the Church, and all due ways, him that shall be Rebel, according to Reason. And according to these Establishments and Securities above-said, both Kings and their Heirs shall by Faith and Oath, Renounce all Wars and Contention. And if by Disobedience, Rebellion, or Power of any Subjects of France, or any just Cause, the King of France or his Heirs, cannot accomplish all the things above-said, the King of England, his Heirs, or any for them, shall not make War against the King of France, his Heirs, or Kingdom; but both together, shall endeavour to bring the Rebels into true Obedience, and accomplish the things above-said. And if any of the Realm, or Obedience of the King of England, will not render the Castles, Towns, and Fortresses, which they hold in the Realm of France, and obey the Treaty above-said, or for just Cause cannot do that, which by this Treaty, they ought to do, the King of France, nor his Heirs, nor any for them, shall make War upon the King of England, or his Kingdom; but both together shall employ their Power to recover the Castles, Towns, and Fortresses; and that all Obedience and Compliance may be given to the Treaty. And there shall be made and given on both sides, according to the nature of the Fact, all manner of Security that shall be known, or can be devised, as well by the Pope, the College of the Court of Rome, as otherwise, holding and keeping the Peace perpetually, and all the things as above-agreed.

" XXXVII. Also, it is agreed, That by this present Treaty, all others, if any have been made before, shall be null and void, and never be any Advantage to either

"for not observing them.

"XXXVIII. Also, the present Treaty shall be Approved, Sworn to, and Confirmed by the two Kings, when they shall meet at Calais; and after the King of France shall be gone from thence, and be in his own Power, within a Month next following, he shall make Letters Patents of Confirmation, and send and deliver them at Calais to the King of England, and receive such and the like from the King of England.

"XXXIX. Also, it is agreed, That neither King shall procure, or cause to be procured, by himself or others, any Injury or Molestation by the Church of Rome, or any of Holy Church whoever they be, to, or concerning this Treaty, towards either of the Kings, their Coadjutors, Adherents, and Allies, whoever they be, or their Lands or Subjects, on occasion of the War, or other thing, or for Service the Coadjutors, Adherents, or Allies of either side have performed; or if our Holy Father will do it of himself, both Kings shall hinder it, as well as they can without Deceit.

"XL. Also, the Hostages that are to be delivered to the King of England at Calais, the manner and time thereof, the two Kings shall there direct (1).

Remarks on the Treaty of Breigny.

After reading this Treaty, the Conditions whereof appear so hard for France, a Man can scarce forbear representing to himself a triumphant King treading upon the Neck of his vanquished Enemy, and obliging him to receive without Examination whatever Terms he is pleased to impose. Indeed this Idea is very just, provided it be not carried too far. But if we pretend to add that of an unjust Conqueror exacting from his Enemy, Conditions entirely repugnant to Reason and Equity, we shall doubtless frame a wrong Idea of this famous Treaty; the Terms whereof are more moderate, than they appear at first sight. For it must be remembered that almost all the Provinces resigned by France to England, belonged formerly to Edward's Predecessors, and that not by Conquest, or Treaties extorted by Violence, but by a Right of Inheritance, immemorably received from their Ancestors. Never were the Kings of France heard to complain, that the Dukes of Guienne, or the Earls of Poitiers had wrested these Countries from them by force. On the contrary, we have seen in the History of the foregoing Kings, that Philip Augustus and St. Lewis dispossessed by force of Arms John Lackland and Henry III., not only of the Provinces in question, but likewise of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Normandy. Moreover the Treaty by which they were surrendered to France, was made whilst Henry III. was in Captivity to the Earl of Leicester. Upon the Supposition of these Truths, it is easy to perceive the Foundation of this Treaty. Edward, improving such favorable Junctures, aimed at the Recovery of what was before wrested, by France from his Ancestors. It is true he required moreover Calais, the Earldom of Guisnes, and the Sovereignty of the Provinces he recovered. To clear this Article, it must be observed, Edward had a Right to demand whatever belonged to his Predecessors, not to mention now his Claim to the Crown itself. In this Belief, he thought, in leaving to France, Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, with the Homage of Bretagne, he gave an Equivalent for Guisnes and Calais, and the Sovereignty of Guienne. And if to this Cession he now added his Title to the Crown of France, which no doubt he deemed very plausible, since he made it the Ground of the War, I do not know whether there will be any great Cause to exclaim against the Unreasonableness of this Treaty. Edward therefore cannot be blamed for being willing to recover Guienne and all its Dependencies, without condemning at the same time Philip Augustus and St. Lewis, who took by Force the greatest Part of that Province from his Ancestors; and Philip de Valois, who seized the rest before the War was declared, upon the frivolous pretence of Edward's refusing to obey his Order, forbidding all his Subjects and Vassals to harbour Robert d'Artois. If Edward had received that Prince at Bourdeaux, there would have been something to object, but his being Vassal for Guienne could not rob him of the Privilege of acting as King of England. In fine, will it be said, that the Kings of France above-mentioned had a Right to re-annex to the Crown, Provinces that were part of the Kingdom under the second Race? But Hugh Capet granted them in Fee to Lords, from whom they were devolved to the Kings of England by lawful Succession. Wherefore it can only be pretended that Philip Augustus had just Cause to confiscate Normandy, Poitou, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and that Guienne was justly forfeited by Edward III. But all this is much easier said than proved. If a Prescription of seventy Years is alledged in favour of France, a much longer may be pleaded in behalf of the Kings of England, when these Countries were taken from them.

In fine, if any one still imagines that Edward performed not his Vow, to conclude a Peace upon equitable Terms, let him add to the foregoing Remarks, the Consideration of the State of the French Affairs at the time of the Treaty of Breigny. King John was Prisoner at London, and the Dauphin shut up in Paris, from whence he durst not stir. An Army of a hundred thousand Englishmen was in the Center of the Kingdom, to which no considerable Body of Troops could be opposed. Edward was Master of many Places taken by himself, or Generals, since his Invasion. In short, an universal Conternation was spread all over the Kingdom, from whence the intestine Troubles destroyed all hopes of ever being able to expel the English. These were very real Advantages which Edward actually enjoyed. He might therefore justly hope to become master of all France, and attain the end he proposed to himself in beginning the War. What then prevented his improving to favorable a Juncture? Certainly it could be nothing else but Willingness to be satisfied with a Part, when he might have expected the whole; and with a Part which he thought might with Justice be taken from France, by whom it was unjustly acquired. It is time now to return to the Occurrences after the Peace of Breigny (2).

This famous Treaty, negotiated in eight Days, was approved by both Kings. John was conducted to Calais in July (3), and stayed there four Months, according to Agreement. At his first Meal he was waited upon by Edward's four Sons, who showed him all possible Respect, pursuant to the King their Father's Orders. These four Months were spent in drawing up all the necessary Acts, as well for explaining as confirming and executing the Treaty, that they might be all signed the same Day. It was not till the 24th of October that the two Kings signed and swore the Treaty at Calais, where Edward came some Days before. All Matters concerning the Treaty being finished, King John was released on the 26th of the same Month. Just before his Departure, Edward gave him a sensible Mark of Friendship, in permitting him to carry with him Prince Philip his Son, taken at the Battle of Poitiers. Of all his Children this was his greatest Favorite. And though of all the Hostages in Edward's Hands, this was the chief, by reason of his Father's Affection for him, he very readily consented, he should be one of the ten that were to be freed by the XXII Article of the Peace of Breigny. The two Monarchs upon parting gave mutual Tokens of cordial Love and Esteem (4).

As soon as John arrived at St. Omer, he ratified by his Letters Patent, and voluntarily swore to, all the Articles of the Treaty of Breigny. By that he showed, no Violence had been used to oblige him to swear at Calais. The rest of his Behaviour was agreeable to this first Step. He showed upon all occasions that his Intention was to perform his Engagements, and at last gave the most sensible Proof of it, by putting Edward in possession of the Countries resigned to him. There was only some Difficulty concerning the Earldom of Gaure in Gasconne, and the Territory of Belville in Poitou, about which the two Kings could not agree (5).

The Peace between the two Crowns appearing thus firmly established, Edward sent [Sir John] Chandos into France, to command in his Name, in the Countries belonging to him, with the Title of Lieutenant-General. He could not make a better Choice (6). Chandos was one of the most accomplished Lords then in England;

(1) In the corrected Instrument or Letters of this Treaty, the Words (Resort and Sovereignty,) are always, and in all Articles, omitted, in respect to the King of England's enjoying them in the Places which were to be delivered to him, while in the uncorrected Articles, and Instrument they are given to him.

(2) As soon as King Edward received the News of the Ratification of this Treaty by the Dauphin Regent of France, he raised his Camp from Breigny, and moving to Calais, came over to England, and landed at Rye on May 18. See Chiffet, p. 692. Rymer's Fœd. T. III. 6. p. 126.

(3) A sufficient Fleet was equipped for that purpose, under the command of Sir John Beauchamp; King John was attended to Calais by Prince Edward, the Duke of Lancaster, and many other Noblemen; they arrived there on July 19. Ibid. p. 128.

(4) A truce being thus brought to a Conclusion, King Edward embarked at Calais, October 31, and landed at Dover the next Morning.

(5) This Year there were two Parliaments held in England. Notitia Parliamentaria. 1361. which is no small Commendation, considering the time. As affable and temperate in Peace, as he was brave in War, he was a Subject every way qualified for so great an Employ. As the King designed to gain the Affection of his new Subjects, he had taken care to send them for Governor, a Person whose Prudence was extremely proper to produce that Effect. Moreover, he settled upon him a very considerable Salary, which enabled him to keep a splendid Court at Niort in Poitou, where he resided; and invested him with Power to pardon all sorts of Crimes; that both by his outward Lustre, and the Distribution of his Favours, he might procure for his Master the Love of the newly conquered People (1).

When Edward saw he was like to enjoy a lasting Peace, he restored to the Alien-Priors (2) the Lands taken from them twenty Years before, towards the Charges of the War. A thing very uncommon, to see Princes freely make Restitution of what they have once acquired.

The Plague still raged in England this Year. Among the rest, it deprived the Kingdom of the Duke of Lancaster, the most esteemed of all the English Lords. He was commonly called the Good Duke. Accordingly, his Death was extremely lamented. He founded the Collegiate-Church of Leicester, and in the same Place an Hospital for three hundred poor Men, which still subsists to this Day (3).

The Prince of Wales, who never thought of marrying during the War, took this peaceable Time to espouse Joanna of Kent, his Cousin, Countess Dowager of Holland. This Princess was Daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, beheaded in the beginning of this Reign, by the Intrigues of Queen Isabella and Mortimer. She was commonly called Joanna the Fair, by reason of her great Beauty.

The next Year, the King being pleased to give publick Marks of his Esteem and Affection for the Prince his eldest Son, who had raised to so great a Height the Glory of the English Name, erected for him the Duchy of Gaunie into a Principality, under the Name of the Principality of Aquitaine. Then he solemnly invested the Prince with it, obliging him only to pay yearly, in lieu of all Service, an Ounce of Gold to the Crown of England (4).

Edward spent the rest of this Year in making several wise Regulations with his Parliament, concerning domestic Affairs (5). Such, for example, was the decreeing that for the future, in the Courts of Justice, and in all Publick Acts (6), the English Language should be used instead of the French or Norman, introduced by William the Conqueror.

In this Parliament the King declared, that being arrived at his fiftieth Year, he would have it solemnized as a sort of Jubilee. To that end, he granted a general Pardon for all Offences whatever, Treason itself not excepted (7); He confirmed also Magna Charta, which was confirmed ten several times in this Reign.

After Edward had performed what he thought necessary for the Publick, he was pleased likewise to do something for his Family, by creating Lionel, his third Son, Duke of Clarence; John of Gant, his fourth Son, Duke of Lancaster; And the fifth, called Edmund, Earl of Cambridge. In fine, after establishing the Staple of Wool at Calais, he was pleased to spend the rest of the Winter in Entertainments and Diversions. He took a Progress into several Counties, attended by the principal Nobility, and the French Hostages, who partook of all the Recreations which the People strove to divert their Sovereign with.

In the beginning of the Year 1363 (8), the Prince of Wales departed for his Government of Aquitaine. He resided at Bordeaux, where he kept a Royal Court, beloved and respected by all his Subjects, who were very happy in being governed by so great a Prince (9).

This same Year was remarkable for King John's Return into England, where it is pretended he came to yield himself Prisoner again, to atone for the Fault committed by the Duke of Anjou, his second Son, in withdrawing from Calais without leave. At least, this is the Reason generally given of this extraordinary Proceeding. Some add, he had a mind to confer in Person with Edward about the Crusade, of which he was declared General by the Pope. There are Historians, who have made no scruple to advance a much less noble Motive of his Return. They pretend, his Passion for the Countess of Salisbury, was the real Cause of this Journey, to which other Motives served only for a Pretence. But this is a romantick Notion, without any Foundation (10). Whatever enquiry has been hitherto made, the real Occasion of this Prince's Return, is still a Secret. That of Love is the most unlikely; and that of repairing the Fault of the Duke of Anjou, though adopted by the Generality of Historians, is, I think, groundless. To clear this Matter, it will be necessary to relate some Particulars which belong to the History, and which I have reserved for this Place, though they were transferred between the Treaty of Bretigny, and the Time I am now speaking of.

Among the thirty Hostages in the Hands of Edward, besides the Burgers of several Cities, there were four Princes of the Blood; namely, Philip, Duke of Orleans, King John's Brother; Lewis, Duke of Anjou; John, Earl of Palatinate, afterwards Duke of Berry; and the Duke of Bourbon. These four Princes, continually seized, The Lords of the Flower de Luce, being tied at England, fought all possible means to retain into their Country. This however was no easy thing, since upon these four Hostages, Edward chiefly relied for the full Performance of the Treaty of Bretigny, and particularly for the Payment of King John's Ransom. Nevertheless, by their Solicitations, they agreed with him for their Liberty, upon the following Terms: I. That the King should release these four Princes, provided, that before the first of November, the Territory of Bevoille, and Earldom of Guine were resigned to him, with two hundred thousand Florins. II. That before the Departure of the Princes, certain Lands in Poitou should be given him for Pledge.

III. That in case the first Article was not executed by the Time agreed on, the Lands given in Pledge should remain to the King for ever, and the four Princes be obliged to surrender themselves in Hostage as before. There were some other Articles, but of no Use in clearing this Fact. John ratified this Agreement, and the four Hostages were conducted to Calais, where they continued upon their Parole, till the Execution of the first Article. They had liberty to go out of the Town whenever they pleased, and even to stay away three Days, provided they came and lodged within the Walls on the fourth. It appears by Edward's Letter to the Prince of Wales, inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Agreement was not executed, and thereby the Princes despaired of recovering their Liberty so soon (11). The Duke of Anjou, more impatient, and less scrupulous than the rest, took advantage of his Permission to go out of Calais, to make his escape, and returned no more. Four other less considerable Hostages followed his ill Example. This is the Foundation whereon it is asserted, that King John came and surrendered himself Prisoner at London; namely, to repair the Fault of the Prince his Son. But as nothing in the Collection of the Publick Acts gives the least Hint, that this was the Motive of his Voyage, there is great reason to question it. Besides, King John was by no means obliged to take this Step, even tho' all the Hostages had made their Escape; his whole Engagement consisting only in sending the same Hostages, or others of the like Quality in their room (12). Now it is not said, that the Duke of Anjou absented himself from his Father's Court, and con-

163. frequently it was easy to fend him back. In short, if John returned to London as a Prisoner, he would by that very thing have freed all the Hostages, since they were detained at present only as Security for the Payment of his Ransom. All the rest of the Articles of the Treaty of Breteigny were executed, except that relating to Gauze and Belille, which required not so great Security. And yet, during John's three Months stay at London, there was never any talk of releasing the Hostages. Freiffart, whose Testimony is urged, does not say, John surrendered himself Prisoner again, but only that one of the Motives of his Voyage was to excuse, and not to repair, the Duke of Anjou's Fault. These are the Historian's own Words: *I was then informed, and true it was, that King John purposed and desired to go and see King Edward, his Brother, in England, and could not be dissuaded from his purpose, though he was sufficiently advised to the contrary: And being told by several Barons and Prelates, he was going to commit a great Indiscretion, he replied, He had found so much Honour in the King of England and his Sons, that he did not question their proving his true and faithful Friends on all occasions: and moreover, he had a mind to excuse the Duke of Anjou his Son, who was returned into France. Here is nothing impious, that John returned to England to yield himself Prisoner, and therefore it is plainly a groundless Assertion. As for the third Motive, namely, his desire to confer with Edward about the Crusade, it is much more probable. But after all, this is only a Conjecture, which cannot be entirely relied on (1).*

When Edward heard, John was landed at Dover (2), he sent the Princess his Sons, with a great Retinue of Nobles, to receive him, and conduct him to London, where he paid him all the Respect due to his Rank and Merit. The Kings of Scotland and Cyprus, who were then in England, made his Reception the more splendid. The former was come to pay Edward a Visit, and the latter to desire his Aid against the Infidels. Upon so uncommon an occasion, Edward took a Pleasure in entertaining his illustrious Guests, with all possible Magnificence, and with all the Diversions he could think of. The Mayor of London, made a splendid Entertainment for the four Kings, in the Name of the City. The Sumptuousness of Sir Henry Picard, Citizen and Wine-Merchant, ought not to be passed over in Silence. He invited all the four Kings, with their Retinues, to a Feast at his own House (3), where they were magnificently entertained. King John lodged in the Palace of the Savoy, as before, and was still treated at the King's Expence. About the middle of March, three Months after his Arrival at London, he was seized with a Distemper of which he died on the 8th of April 1364, to Edward's great Grief, who had a singular Esteem for his Virtue. There is ascribed, to this Prince a Saying, worthy to be had in eternal Remembrance by Posterity: Though Faith and Truth were banished from the rest of the World, they ought, however, to be preserved in the Mouth of Kings. It is pretended, this was said on the occasion of his returning to England; but it may, with much more likelihood, be ascribed to his sincere Performance of the Treaty of Breteigny, in spite of the Obstacles thrown in his way by some of his Counsellors (4). Charles V, his Successor, followed not the same Maxi-

Edward's good Fortune not only fled its Influence on himself and his Subjects, but also on his Allies. This same Year, John de Montfort his Son-in-law, won the famous Battle of Arzoy, against Charles de Blois his Competitor, who was slain. This Victory decided the Quarrel between the two Houses, who were contending for the Dutchy of Bretagne, and produced the Treaty of Guendee, whereby Bretagne was assigned to John de Montfort, who did Homage for it to the King of France (5). Bertrand du Guesclin, who served Charles de Blois, and became afterwards very famous, was taken in this Battle by Sir John Chandos, General of the English Troops in Montfort's Service.

The English Name was then famous in all Parts of the World. Some gallant Englishmen who had attended [Guy de Lusignan] King of Cyprus into the East, performed Wonders, and returned loaded with Honours and Riches taken from the Infidels. At the same time, Thomas Hawkwood an Englishman, who departed from England a Journeyman Taylor, taking afterwards to Arms, signalized himself in the Italian Wars, by his Valour and Conduct, which raised him to the highest Posts. He gained such Honour and Reputation for restoring in those parts military Discipline, which was almost entirely lost, that after his Death the Florentines erected in their City, a black Marble Statue, in memory of the Services he had done them (6). John Chandos and Robert Knolles distinguished themselves likewise in a very singular manner, in all Edward's Wars with France. The Fame of the English not only reached beyond the Alps, but flew also over the Pyrenean Mountains, as we shall see presently (7).

Edward's great Acquisitions in France, made Pope Urban VI, think the present Juncture very proper, to demand the Tribute promised by King John Lackland, to the Roman Church, and of which there was thirty years Arrears due. In this belief, he was pleased to require the Payment, but with so much Haughtiness, that he nominated, even beforehand, Commissioners to summon Edward before him in case of refusal. The King's great Spirit not brooking such hungry Proceedings, he caused the Pope's Demand to be laid before the Parliament (8), where it was declared, "That the King of England, had not Power to bring his Realm in such Servitude, without the consent of Parliament: That, if Necessary, forced King John to such a proceeding, his Engagement was Null, as being contrary to his Coronation-Oath." This august Assembly, not content with so particular a Decision, came also to this vigorous Resolution: "That, if the Pope should attempt by any means whatever, to prosecute his unjust Pretensions, the Nation should with all their Power oppose him." The Firmness of the Parliament caused the Pope to desist, and had not only a present Effect, but prevented the Kings of England from being ever after troubled, upon that Occasion.

The Prince of Wales lived three Years in Guenne without exercising his Valour, and even without any Prospect of doing it a good while. On a sudden he was drawn out of this State of Tranquillity, by the Solicitations of Peter King of Castile, surnamed the Cruel, who was lately expelled his Dominions. Never did Prince give his People greater Cause of Discontent. Cruel to excess, and of an unbounded Avarice, he illegally put to Death his

(4) As soon as John, that King John on his Death-bed confided to Edward, that he had Condescended in London and elsewhere, who secretly collected the best G. d. of the Kingdom, made it into Plates, and sent it in Barrels to France, with great quantities of Bows and Arrows, &c. and that he had actually withheld the Crown of France from him, till the Peace of Breteigny. For all which, upon his Request, Edward entirely forgave him, and called the G. d. and Arrows to be seized. But this seems to be an improbable and not clear Story, inconsistent with the Character of this Prince, who was a cruel one of the bravest, and most liberal and sincere Prince of his Time. His Body was carried into France, and buried at St. Denis.

(5) The Battle was fought in September 29. King Edward made the Pursuivant at Arms, who brought him the News of this Victory, a Herald by the name of W. Iff, which Title continues to this Day. Freiffart. l. 1. c. 225. 1164.

(6) When, upon the Discovery of the Treason to the French King by the Treaty of Breteigny, the Officers and Soldiers were ordered to depart, some English, and many to the Germans and Flemings, related to they those Orders; and being resolved to maintain themselves by War, great Numbers of common soldiers of all Nations, fled to them, and increasing to sixteen thousand Men, ravaged France in a miserable Manner. At length dividing themselves into three, he engaged the Marquis of Montfort to his these Adventurers, to assist him in his Wars against the Viscount of Melun. The Marquis afterwards treated with their Captain Sir John Hawkwood an Englishman, and agreeing with him, Hawkwood went with his Men into Italy, to the great Joy of the French King. Hawkwood was a Tanner's Son of Ely, and being bound Apprentice to a Tailor in London quitted his Trade, and went to a Soldier into France, where he was knighted for his Valour, and going into Italy (as was said) was so much in favour with the Duke of Milan, that he gave him his natural Daughter in Marriage. After the Duke's Death, he served the Commonwealth of Florence, and performed such great Actions for them, that, upon their Request, they erected a Monument for him in the Cathedral of that City. The Translator serving as Chaplain to Sir Charles Wylton, in the late Expedition to Italy on Don Carlos's Account, and being at Florence took particular notice of this Monument. He is painted on the Wall of the Church on Hawkwood in Armour, the whole of a green Colour, with these two lines under his Horse's Feet.

1366. great Men, with the sole View of confiscating their Estates. He model only the gratifying his Passions, without any regard to Honour or Conscience. His Barba- rity was grown to that Height, that he poisoned Blanche de Bar: his Wife, Sister of the Queen of France, to marry Matin de Padilla, whom he had long kept as his Mistress. Of his five Bastard-Brothers, the eldest had lately been sacrificed to his Suspicions, and the other four were in Danger. Henry Earl of Triguemare, one of these Brothers, seeing himself every moment threatened with the same Fate, rebelled against Peter, and engaged in his Quarrel the King of Aragon, with the principal Cas- tilian Lords, who could no longer bear the Tyranny of their Sovereign. His Enterprize being at first unsuccess- ful, he was repulsed by the Tyrant, and forced to fly to the King of France, who promised him Aid. Besides King Charles's desire to revenge the Death of the Queen his Sister-in-law, he was very glad to find Employment for a great Number of idle Soldiers, who, since the late Peace, swarmed in France, and committed great Disorders (1). With this View, he raised for Henry's Assis- tance an Army, the Command whereof, he gave to John de Bontoun Earl of Marche, the Queen's Cousin-German, and was pleased that du Guislin, whose Ransom he paid to Ghandes, should be of this Expedition.

With these Troops, and the Assistance of the Castilian, Henry marched through Aragon into Castile, where the Tyrant saw himself immediately forsaken by all his Nobles, except one single Knight. This Defection putting it out of his Power to withstand his Brother, he would have retired into Portugal, but was dejected Entrance. In this Distress, he chose to go out of Spain, by way of Bayonne, from whence he repaired to Bordeaux, to implore the Aid and Protection of the Prince of Wales. If the young Heroe had reflected on the Unworthiness of the Prince who desired his Assistance, he would doubtless have refused his Request. But considering, on this Occasion, the Honour of restoring a deposed King, and perhaps of an unactive Life, he undertook to replace him on the Throne. To that end, he levied an Army of thirty thousand Men, and marched at their Head towards Spain, loaded with Promises (2) from the Castilian, and big with Expectation of gathering fresh Laurels (3). As he had no other way to enter Castile but through Navarre, he had taken care to secure a Passage, by a Treaty with the King of that Country (4). So he marched without Op- position to the Frontiers of Castile. Henry, who was now crowned at Burgos, receiving advice of the March of the English Prince, advanced towards Navarre with a power- ful Army, to oppose his Passage. He might very possibly have executed his Design, considering the Superiority of his Forces, had he been so wise as to avoid a Battle.

This the Prince of Wales's most apprehensive of, and therefore to provoke him, sent him every insulting Distance, which Henry could not but be sensible of. The two Armies approaching each other, the Battle was fought near Ne- jara (5), a little Town on the Frontiers of Castile. As the Fields of Croissy and Poitiers had seen the Prince of Wales perform Wonders, that of Nejara was likewise Witness of his heroic Actions, which after a long Struggle, made Victory incline to his Side. The Spanish Army reinforced with a strong Body of French Troops, was en- tirely routed. Bertrand du Guislin, with the Marshal D'Endreghen were taken Prisoners. Henry having no refuge left in Castile, after the loss of his Army, retired into Aragon, from whence he repaired to Languedoc, to implore the Aid of the Duke of Anjou the Governor.

Peter was at first so grieved, that presently after the Battle, he threw himself at the Prince of Wales's Feet, to thank him for restoring him to his Kingdom. The Prince of Wales lifting him up immediately, and holding him in his Arms, said, "It was to God alone he was indebted for the Victory, and not to a Prince who was only a weak Instrument in his Hand". The Consequ- ence of this good Success, was the Restoration of Peter to the Throne from whence he had been driven. It was now time for that Prince to think of performing his Pro- mises, and rewarding the brave Soldiers, who had ven- tured their Lives in his Service. But as he was no less perfidious than cruel, after long feeding them with hopes of Provisions and Money, he repaid them with black In- gratitude. Want soon bred among the Soldiers a Mor- tality, which swept away great Numbers, and the fear of losing the rest obliged the Prince, who saw himself badly amused, to retire extremely disaffected. He was even forced to sell his Plate, to provide for the more pressing occasions of his Army, till he could entirely satisfy them. But this was not all the Mischiefs caused by this fatal Ex- pedition. During the Prince's stay in Spain, he contracted a Distemper of which he never recovered.

Thus ended the Enterprize of the Prince of Wales, an Enterprize glorious indeed, if the Success only be con- sidered, but not very honorable as to the Cause he espoused, since it was solely to restore to the Throne the basest of Princes. Heaven afterwards took care to revenge the English and Castilian. Du Guislin paying his Ransom, went and joined Henry again, and both together laboured, with the Assistance of France, to bring a fresh Army into the Field. As soon as they were ready, they re-en- tered Castile, and made so great a Progress, that they were soon in condition to besiege Seville. Peter flying to the Relief of that City, was defeated and forced to retire to the Castle of Moultel, where he was immediately invested. As he saw his Case to be desperate, he resolved to go to Du Guislin in his Tent, imagining he would procure him tolerable Conditions, or help him to make his Escape. Unhappily for him, he found Henry, his Brother there. The two Princes falling first to Reproaches and then to Blows, Henry threw his Brother to the Ground, and stabbed him with his Dagger. After that he caused himself to be once more acknowledged King of Castile, without any Opposition.

Edward III. has appeared hitherto on the Theatre of the World, as one of the most glorious Princes that ever sat on a Throne. If he had finished his Career before the close of his reign, I am going to speak of, perhaps it would have been difficult to find an Instance of a Reign more constantly glorious. But his latter Years will present us with a very different Scene from those we have seen. Fortune grew weary of favouring this Monarch in his old Age, after having him so much in his younger Days. She robbed him before his Death of all his glorious Conquests, which were purchased so dearly, and these Losses were attended with many other Vexations. This is what remains to be con- sidered in the Sequel of this Reign (6).

Lancel Duke of Clarence Edward's third Son, being contracted to Violanta Daughter of John Calozano Duke of Milan (7), went to consummate his Marriage, with a splendid Retinue, and many young Noblemen who at- tended him to do him honour. For some time there was nothing but Entertainments and Diversions, which were daily renewed in favour of a Prince whose Alliance was so honourable to the Duke of Milan. These Diversions so lavishly procured him, hastened his end. Five Months after his Marriage, he died in Montferriat in the thirty second Year of his Age. By his first Marriage with the sole Heiress of the Earl of Ulster in Ireland, he left a Daughter called Philippa, of whose Posterity I shall have frequent occasion to speak hereafter (8).

Edward's Trouble for the Loss of his Son was quick- ly followed by another, of which he was no less sensible. The Treaty of Bretigny was so disadvantageous to France, that Charles V., who had himself made it, probably con- sented to it only with Intention to break it, the first Op- portunity. The French were no better disposed. This quickly appeared in all the Difficulties caused by them when the resigned Provinces came to be delivered to the King of England. King John was the only Person that acted with Sincerity, and it was he, that by his own Authority, prevented these Obstacles from being carried

(1) These were the other Body of disbanded Soldiers mentioned in the Note above, who remained in France, and called themselves the Compagnons. They were the Dukes of Orleans and Anjou, under the command of Sir Andreas Dagworth, Son of Sir Thomas Dagworth, treacherously slain in Brasage 1356. As they were most English, the King of England was desired to restrain them by his Authority, who calling them sworn by Proclamation, as they held nothing in England of the King, to neither for him, nor any one else, would they leave their Garrison and Livelihood, to go with so much labour. Hall p. 178.

1569. too far. Charles his Son and Successor, whom the French surname the Wife, was not of so scrupulous a Temper. He was no sooner on the Throne, but he tried to evade what remained unexecuted of the Treaty. He even neglected to do Edward Justice upon the Duke of Angou's Escape, nor delivered up the Earldom of Gauze. The Judgment upon the Affair of Belville, referred to Arbitrators, was delayed on several pretences. King John's Ranfom was not paid, or if Charles paid any thing after his Accession to the Crown, it was but a small part in respect of what was yet due. Mean time Edward, who had still in his hands the Dukes of Berry and Orleans, and several other Hostages, could not imagine, that Charles thought of renewing the War, and believed his Inability to be the only Cause of all these Delays. Affairs proceeded thus slowly from the Death of John, till his Successor was able to take just Measures, to accomplish his Designs. He ever pretended a Willingness to complete the Execution of the Treaty, and, under colour of paying his Father's Ranfom, to which he was bound, he heaped up Money very liberally supplied by the States, well knowing for what it was intended. With this Aid he engaged several German Princes in his Interest, and when he thought Matters ripe, sought a Pretence to break with England.

Edward d. f. 1581 the Lords of Coligny, A.D. 1569. VI. p. 496. Charles promises to protect them.

When Edward was meditating a War with France, he believed it proper to attach to his Service the principal Lords of Guienne, by several Grants which he revoked immediately after a Peace. This Proceeding so exasperated these Lords, that they wanted only a favorable Opportunity to show their Resentment. In all appearance, they would have long waited in vain, if Charles had not given them private Intimation that they should be supported. As soon as they were sure of his Protection, nothing was wanting but a pretence to complain; and they were not long without having one, as they thought, sufficiently plausible, to authorize them to throw off the Mask.

The Prince of Wales lays a Tax on Guienne, Profligate, l. 1. c. 239. 240.

The Prince of Wales having laid upon Guienne a Tax [called Feuage, or Chimney-Money] in order to pay the Arrears due to the Troops levied for the Spanish War (1) inadvertently furnished his Enemies with the desired Opportunity to declare themselves. The Lord d'Arbuis, the Earls of Armagnac, Cominges, Perigord, and Carmaing, incouraging their Vassals to complain of this new Tax, received their Complaints, brought them to the Prince, and addressed him upon that occasion. Their Remonstrances were ill received, both because the Prince was in want of Money, and by reason of the Haughtiness wherewith they were made. This was the very thing the Lords wanted. On pretence they could not have Justice from their Prince, they applied to the King of France, whom they supposed to be still Sovereign Lord of Guienne, and prayed him to grant them Letters of Appeal to his Parliament. Charles not thinking proper to declare himself yet, cherished this Disposition, and in the mean time, kept them at Paris. The Journey of these Lords, and their long Stay at the Court of France, gave the Prince of Wales some Suspicion. He writ Letter after Letter to the King his Father, to warn him that something was contriving at Paris against him, but these Warnings were to no purpose. The King and his Council imagining, the warlike Prince tired with an idle Life, sought occasion to renew the War, were regardless of his Remonstrances.

Wal-fog.

Whilst Edward relied on the Sincerity of the French, his Son's Discontent daily growing more dangerous, turned at last to a real Dropfy. The Prince's ill State of Health, and the King his Father's Infirmitie, hastened the Resolutions of the King of France. As he saw there could not be a more favorable Juncture to execute his Designs, he granted the Gajen Lords, the Letters of Appeal they required; pretending, notwithstanding his Oaths, and all his Father's Renignations and Renunciations, that he was still Sovereign of Guienne. He built his Pretensions upon Edward's not having sent his Renunciation to the Crown of France, pursuant to the Treaty of Bretigny. But that Renunciation being only a Consequence of the full Performance of the Treaty, Edward did not think himself, as indeed he was not, bound to make it, till the whole was executed. However he had absolutely quitted the Title of King of France (2), a clear Evidence that he had no ill Intentions. Besides, Charles himself had not been more punctual to renounce the Provinces yielded to England by the Treaty of Bretigny. These reciprocal Renunciations were considered as the Seal of the Treaty, after the two Kings should be satisfied concerning the Execution. However that be, Charles used this Pretence to summon the Prince of Wales to appear before the Court of Peers, to answer for his pretended Tyranny upon the People of those Provinces (3). The Prince's high Spirit not suffering him to bear this Affront, without showing his Resentment, he replied, he would not fail to appear, but it should be at the head of sixty thousand Men. Mean while Charles was amusing Edward, by expostulating with him, as if he were desirous, the Affair should be put in Negotiation. Edward answered by giving Words for Words, not imagining they really designed to dispute his Sovereignty of Guienne, so clearly settled in the Treaty of Bretigny, and much less that France was able to renew the War. But he preposterously flattered himself. It was not the Sovereignty of Guienne only that Charles designed to dispute, he pretended moreover that the Treaty of Bretigny was void, because Edward had not prevented certain Plunderers (4) that came out of his Dominions, from entering France, and because he had not evacuated all the Towns that were to be restored. On these Pretences he ordered War to be proclaimed by a Footman, because the Prince of Wales had seized those that brought him the Summons. Shortly after, he published an Edict confiscating all the Lands held by the English in France, and annexed them to the Crown.

The Praises bestowed on this Prince by the French Writers for so wisely improving the Junctures that offered to recover his Dominions, deserve some Reflection. It is true, he acted with Prudence, if Sincerity and Honesty are to go for nothing. The good Success his Conduct was crowned with, freed France for a Time from her unfortunate Condition. But if we consider it closely, this Prudence is real Perfidiousness. For even supposing, Edward had not executed any one Article of the Treaty, his Non-performance did not give Charles a Right to proclaim War against him. The King his Father and himself had expressly renounced, with an Oath, all violent Methods in case of Non-execution. Besides, he had not himself performed all the Articles of the Treaty, so that all he could reasonably demand, was a Compensation. But it was an open renouncing of good Faith, to annul the whole Treaty, on pretence that some Articles remained still to be performed by England, when he himself left several unexecuted. Moreover, his Pretences of a Rupture were so frivolous, that the French Historians not being able to relate them, precisely, confine themselves to Generals, without mentioning Particulars. The most plausible Pretence alleged by Froissart, is this, The Prince of Wales c. 250.

not having wherewithal to pay the Troops lately returned from Spain, six thousand Men disbanded themselves, and afterwards joining again, committed great Ravages in Guienne. The Prince desiring them to depart his Dominions, they threw themselves into the neighbouring Provinces of France, and plundered them unopposed, the French not being able to hinder them. Supposing the Thing to be as Froissart relates it, it was not more practicable for the Prince of Wales to go into France and quell these roving Plunderers, who had entered that Kingdom. It appears however, he did all that lay in his Power, since he imposed on his Dukedom the Feuage-Tax, in order to pay his Troops. But Charles made this very Thing a pretence for a Rupture, whence it is evident he only sought occasion to quarrel. The same Historian says further, that Charles, ordering the Treaty of Bretigny to be examined in his Council, the chief Debate ran upon the Article, whereby the two Kings renounced all violent Methods in case of Non-execution. He adds, he was advised upon that Foundation to proceed to a Rupture, because Edward never assented to make War upon France. But he does not say, How or Where, neither mentions any Particulars. However, from what that Author relates, it is very easy to infer, that before the Treaty was examined, Charles had resolved upon War, and, that this Examination was only made to find some Pretence. Messier says, the occasion of the Rupture was, Edward's not withdrawing all his Troops out of the Kingdom; but does not name any one Place where these Troops remained. Thus it is manifest, the French Authors were at a loss what to alledge.

From what has been said, it may be easily concluded, that Charles's Widow was not a very scrupulous Virtue; whether he signed the Treaty with an Intention to break it, or formed not that design till a favorable opportunity offered. It is therefore the Effect, and not the Cause, which made this Prince's Conduct to be so much admired. Had he been as unsuccessful, as he was fortunate, he would have re-plunged France into a Gulph of 1369. Misery, and thereby justly incurred the blame of the whole World, and doublets, of those very Writers who have given him for great Commendations.

Before I enter upon the Particulars of this second War, it will be farther necessary to consider, how Matters stood between the two Crowns, at the time of the Rupture. The French complained, Edward had not ceased to make War against France, nor withdrawn all his Troops out of the Kingdom, pursuant to his Engagements. But these are general Complaints, containing no particular Fact. Besides, it is not very likely, that Edward, to whom this Treaty was so advantageous, would have furnished France with a Pretence to break it. The Treaty it self shews, the English Monarch's Engagements were inconsiderable, in respect of the Advantages he reaped by it. This gives occasion to presume, that being a Prince of great Abilities, as all must own, he could not be so unwise, as to raise any Obstacles himself against the Execution of so advantageous a Treaty. As for the pretended Injury done the Gascans by the Prince of Wales, it is evident from the Treaty, that Charles had no right to interpose.

It was not the same with respect to the English, whose Complaints appear much more just. It is true, King John, whose Sincerity can never be too much commended, performed the Treaty to the utmost of his Power. He was no sooner returned into his Dominions, but he ratified every Article, separately, by particular Acts. Then, not content with the swearing himself to the observance thereof, he obliged the Dauphin his Son, who was to succeed him, to take the same Oath. So that all defects in his Engagements, by reason of his Captivity, were removed, by his Ratifications, when at full Liberty in his own Territories. Performance was a still more authentick Confirmation than Promises or Oaths. He put Edward in possession of the Lands resigned by the Treaty, without any reserve, and particularly those held of Guienne. If he had not meant to give up the Sovereignty with the Lands, it is not credible that he, and the Prince his Son, should make no exception of that Sovereignty, either in the Treaty it self, or in any of the Ratifications of each particular Article. At least they would not have neglected to make a Protestation, when Edward erected Guienne into a Principality, and invested the Prince his Son, without the Participation of France. Indeed, there was a Dispute between the two Kings, concerning two inconsiderable Territories, but not to quarrel for such a Trifle, the Matter was put to Arbitration. As for the Ranfom, King John's Inability was the sole Cause of his not paying it at the time appointed. Edward was so well satisfied of that Prince's Sincerity, that he made no scruple to prolong the time of Payment, in order to give him some respite. This Moderation was the reason why at the time of King John's Death, there remained still to pay, two hundred thousand Crowns of the first Million. Moreover, in expectation that John, or the Dauphin his Son, would pay him in Time, Edward was not so strict with regard to the Hostages as he should have been. I have observed, he readily consented, that Prince Philip, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, should be one of the Ten to be released by the XVth Article of the Treaty, tho' it was in his Power to give one of less Distinction. All the rest had in England all the Liberty they could reasonably desire. The Collection of the Publick Acts is full of Licences granted them, to go and take care of their private Affairs in France. The Duke of Anjou, the Earls of Grandpré and Brenne, the Lords of Clermont and Derval, abused this favour, and all Edward's Instances could not procure him the least Satisfaction upon that Article.

The Duke of Orleans, by the Grant of certain Lands to Thomas of Woodstock, one of the King's Sons, procured him, with the Freedom of Andrefel one of the Prisoners.

The Duke of Bourbon having opportunity to do the King some Service with the Pope, was set at Liberty, on payment only of twelve thousand Crowns, given by the Prince of Wales, to the Person that took him at Peicitiers.

The Affair of Bevoille being put to Arbitration, Edward relying on the Sincerity of the French, and the Justice of his Cause, made no scruple to enter into an Engagement, to which he was not obliged. He was pleased, even after the Duke of Anjou's Escape, to promise to release the Duke of Berry, and the Earl of Arden, in case the Matter in dispute was decided in favour of France. He even carried his Generosity so far, as to give these two Princes leave to return home, contenting himself with taking their word, that if the Affair was determined in his favour by the Arbitrators, they would come back to England and remain in Hostage, only till he was in possession of the Territory in Dispute. These two Princes embraced his Generosity, and returned to France. Mean while, the Affair was left undecided, and the Hostages thought no more of returning.

The Earl of St. Pol obtained his Liberty, upon leaving his two Sons in his room.

Charles d'Artois made his Escape without taking Leave.

The Lords of Luxemburg, Estampes and Hengst, died in England, and Charles sent not other Hostages in their room, though he was often required.

The Earl of Harcourt had leave for a certain time, and returned no more.

Guy de Blais did the same thing; but agreed afterwards with Edward, by giving him Saizon.

Montmercy, Boucherche and Mauleverier, had leave to go to France, but took care never to return. It is likely, however, they gave the King some Satisfaction, since we do not find any Complaint against them in the Collection of the Publick Acts, from whence I have taken these Particulars.

As for the other Hostages of less Note, and the Burgesses of the Towns, whereof Toulouse neglected to send Her's, Edward generously gave some their Freedom, and the rest compounded for their Ranfom, or died in England.

As for King John's Ranfom, there still remained unpaid, near two Millions. It is true, Edward received of Charles, at several times, about three hundred thousand Crowns, which, added to what was paid by the King his Father, amounted to little more than the first Million, which was due seven or eight Months before.

It appears then, that Edward was the only Person wronged, and yet Charles pretended, the Treaty of Breigny was void, by the Non-Performance of some Articles on the part of England; Articles which no Historian has distinctly mentioned. Upon this Foundation he asserted, that France, restored to her ancient Right, might justly confiscate the Provinces resigned to England. After these Remarks, which seemed necessary for clearing this Fact, it is time to resume the Thread of the History.

Edward was extremely surprized to find that Charles, Perbent who passed not for a Warrior, durst attempt to enter into competition with a Prince that had gained so many Battles. He was still more astonished, shortly after, when he heard that the Earldom of Pembroke was seized (1), and the principal Cities of Guienne were in Arms against him. He summoned a Parliament (2), which granted him a great Aid to maintain so necessary a War, wherein he was unwillingly engaged. By the Advice of this Parliament, he re-assumed the Title of King of France, which he had relinquished since the Peace (3). After obtaining this Aid from his Subjects, and a positive Promise to support him as long as the War should last, his first Care was to send Troops to the Prince of Wales, to recover the Cities of Guienne. Then he dispatched the Duke of Lancaster, his fourth Son, to Calais, with a powerful Army. But the Duke's Progress ended only in ravaging the open Country, without making any Conquest.

The Renewal of the War was not the only thing that disturbed Edward's Repose this Year. The Loss of his Queen was to him a very great Increase of Affliction. He had lived with her forty Years in perfect Union, and had by her twelve Children. This good Queen was likewise extremely lamented by the People,

(1) By Guy Count de St. Paul, and Sir Hugh de Cheshill, Master of the Cross-Bows of France. Præf. l. 1. c. 246.

(2) This Parliament met at Wigmore, May 27, and granted the King for three Years, of Denizens for every Six of Wool, forty three Shillings and Four-pence; and of every Last of Skins, four Pounds. Of Aliens, for every Six of Wool, fifty three Shillings and Four-pence; and of every twenty dozen of Fells, fifty three Shillings and Four-pence; and of every Last of Skins, five Pounds six Shillings and Eight-pence, over the old Customs. Rot. Parl. 43 Edw. III. M. 1. 9. 10. Edward's Advice, p. 108, St. There was, it seems, another Parliament this Year which was sitting, when the French Valet came to London, and declared War against England. See Baron, p. 739 Fræf. c. 249.

(3) This Year the King set forth an Order for the arming of all Clergymen. Part of it runs thus: "The King commands and requires all the Prelates assembled in Parliament, that in regard of the great Danger and Damage, which may happen to the Realm and Church of England by reason of the War, in case the Enemy should invade the Kingdom, that they will appear themselves in the Defence of the Realm, and cause their Tenants, Dependents, Monks, Priests, Deans, &c. to be prepared for the Field in a military Manner, and be ready to encounter the Force, and discomfiture the Malice of his Enemies." All which the Prelates in Parliament engaged to perform. Rot. in Tur. Lond. in 43 Edward III. Rymer's Fæd. Tom. VI. p. 631.

1373. Edward's Affairs prospered little better in Bretagne, though the Duke his Son-in-law did his utmost to promote them. The People were weary of War, and were troubled to see, that, solely for the Int rest of the English, they were going to be plunged again into th. ir late Calamities. On the other hand, the Lords of Bretagne, bribed by French Penions, opposed with all their Power their Prince's Designs, and treated as Enemies, the Troops sent thither by Edward to support the War. In this Situation, the Duke, whose Heart was entirely English, had it not in his Power to serve the King his Father-in-law as he wished, or to perform his late Treaty. Thus embarrassed, he resolved to go himself into England, and solicit a Supply capable of procuring him greater Authority in his own Dominions. Edward was very sensible of the Importance of this Demand, but could not do every thing (1). He was obliged therefore to send back the Duke of Bretagne with fair Promises only, whilst he turned all his Thoughts to reform the Affairs of Guienne, which touched him more nearly (2).

1374. Pursuant to his Resolution to make a powerful Effort in the Duke of Gascogne, he assembled an Army of thirty thousand Men, the Command whereof was given to the Duke of Lancaster his Son, stiled in England, King of Castile (3). The Duke landing at Calais (4), traversed all France without Opposition, and came to Bordeaux (5). From thence he advanced into upper Guienne, with Design to expel the Duke of Anjou, who had taken several Towns. He offered him Battle, which the French Prince accepted. The time and Place were now appointed, but the two Generals receiving Advice of a Truce concluded between the two Crowns, both retired (6).

1375. Some time since, at the pressing Instances of the Pope, the two Kings sent Plenipotentiaries (7) to Bruges, where the forementioned Truce was concluded, in order to labour for a Peace more sedately. But the Pretensions of the two Monarchs being too opposite, for a Peace to be easily made, their Negotiation ended only in a Prolongation of the Truce to April 1377. As soon as the Truce was signed the Duke of Lancaster led back his Troops into England (8).

Though the Consequences of this last War were no less considerable than those of the former, since France recovered in this, whatever she lost in the other, yet, the Particulars are very far from being so entertaining. In the first, Edward's Conquests were rendered illustrious by a naval Engagement, where the King commanded in Person. The Battle of Griffy, where all the Nobles of both Kingdoms fought in the presence of the two Kings, and gained by a Prince of sixteen Years old, is one of the most moving Scenes in History. The Conquest of Calais, in the Sight of an Army of a hundred and fifty thousand Men, is no less capable of affecting the Reader. The Victory of Poisiers, obtained by an Army of twelve thousand against sixty thousand, and the taking of King John, are Events which command our Admiration, and quicken our Attention. In a word, the first War was ended by the most important and solemn Treaty, ever made between the two Crowns. In the second, there was not one general Action. The two Kings, contenting themselves with directing their Affairs in the Cabinet, never appeared at the head of their Armies. As for the Sieges, excepting those of Limoges and Rochelle, there was scarce one worth mentioning. The Towns lost by the English, were taken or surprized with a wonderful Rapidity. Some even surrendered before the Enemy's Approach. The Losses therefore of the English may be truly called a Defeat, which affords but few Particulars proper to satisfy the Reader's Curiosity. For this reason, I have not insisted upon a Detail, which must have been tedious. It suffices to observe, that at the time of the last Treaty, England had lost whatever was acquired by the Treaty of Bretigny, except Calais alone. So true is it, that Acquisitions gained by force of Arms, ought not to be relied on, as has been, and is daily confirmed by numberless Instances. Sooner or later a superior Force finds means to wrest them from the Conqueror, or his Children. Thus France lost in the Reign of John, what was conquered upon the English by Philip Augustus and St. Lewis, and thus Edward III lost the Conquests made by himself in France. We shall see in the Course of this History, that one of Edward's Successors amply retrieved all these Losses, and the French, in their turn, recovered, quickly after, whatever was taken by the same Prince. Such Examples, frequently occurring in History, ought to teach Princes to moderate their Ambition, but few are so wise as to profit by these Examples. If we inquire into the natural Causes of this Revolution by which Edward lost what he had acquired by the Treaty of Bretigny, they will appear to be very obvious. The Revolt of the Gascans, the Prince of Wales's Distemper, Edward's old Age, his too credulous Reliance on the King of France's Sincerity, the Prudence of Charles the Wise, who, without stirring from the Cabinet, managed the whole War, the Conduct and Bravery of Bertrand du Guesclin, were the Instruments in the Hand of Providence, to produce this Revolution.

The English were in some measure comforted for all their Losses, by the Tranquillity enjoyed by the Truce. The King himself appeared to lay aside his martial Inclinations, for others, which somewhat endangered his Reputation. In his old Age he fell in Love with one Alice Pierce (9). His Passion had such an ascendant over him, that it made him guilty of Weaknesses unbecoming to great a Prince. The Money raised for the War, was He wastes quickly consumed by this greedy She-Favourite. From thence followed an universal Discontent throughout the Kingdom. Wholly employed with pleasing his Mistress, the King thought only of procuring her Diversions. Entertainments were daily made with immense Expence. Taxes were the more grievous, as the Nation was entirely drained by continual Wars. They were extremely troubled, to see the Money designed for the payment of the Publick Debts, squandered away in Vanities. Above all, a Tournament held in Smithfield gave great offence, where Alice Pierce, to whom her old Lover had given the Name of Lady of the Sun, appeared by his Side in a very triumphant Chariot, and attended by many Ladies of Quality, each leading a Knight by his Horse's Bridle. When the King's Coffers were empty, he called a Parliament (10) to demand a Subsidy. But he had the mortification to see that his People, who so powerfully assisted him in his glorious Undertakings, had not the same Zeal, to provide for useless Expences. Before the Subsidy was granted, the Parliament bitterly complained of the ill-management of his Ministers, particularly of the Duke of Lancaster, whom the King his Father had chiefly intrusted with the Administration of Affairs. They even petitioned the King to remove from his Person the Duke of Lancaster his Son, Alice Pierce (11); Latimer Lord Chamberlain, and others that were most in his favour. This Petition was made with such Warmth, that the King perceiving he could not reject it without Danger, granted their Request, left in their turn the Parliament should refuse him the Money he wanted. It was Holingh.

The 16th of the same Month, died Humfrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton, Countess of England, the tenth of that Name, and last Male of that noble Family. He left behind him only two Daughters, Eleanor, afterwards married to Thomas of Woodstock, King Edward's youngest Son; and Mary to Henry Earl of Derby, who became King by the name of Henry IV. Id. Vol. I. p. 189.

1376. not questioned, but the Prince of Wales had privately induced the Parliament to take this Step, in order to remove the Duke of Lancaster, who was in too great Credit with the King. As the Prince found he must die, he could not reflect without Uneasiness, that he was going to leave his young Son Richard to the Mercy of an ambitious Uncle, who might use his Credit to take the Crown from him. And indeed, Richard, by reason of his Youth, was incapable of opposing the Duke's Designs, in case they should tend, as it was suspected, to the procuring himself to be declared the King's presumptive Heir, after the Death of his elder Brother. This obliged the Prince of Wales to seek, for his Son, the Protection of the Parliament, as the only means to support him in his just Rights. For the same reason, probably, the Parliament (1) petitioned the removal of the Duke of Lancaster. During this Session, Edward, now in the fiftieth Year of his Reign, caused a General Pardon to be published, which pleased the whole Nation exceedingly.

A Sorrow no less universal quickly followed this Joy. It was caused by the Death of the Prince of Wales, the most excellent Prince England had ever produced. He was possessed of all the Virtues in an eminent degree. A good Soldier, and a great General, brave without Fierceness, bold in Battle, but very affable in Conversation, and of a Modesty which could never be sufficiently admired. Ever submissive and respectful to the King his Father, whom he never once disobliged. Generous, liberal, pleased with rewarding Merit wherever he found it, he wanted no Qualification requisite to form a perfect Hero. The English commonly called him, The Black Prince, not for his warlike Exploits, as some have imagined, but because he wore Black Armour. The News of his Death was received with unconceivable Grief, though it was long expected. The Parliament was willing, on this occasion, to express their just Sorrow for the loss of so great a Prince, who had gained the Affection and Esteem of the whole Nation, by attending his Corps to Canterbury, where he chose to be interred (2). This renowned Prince died in the forty sixth Year of his Age, lamented by the King his Father, who shewed upon this occasion less Firmness, than he had done in all his other Misfortunes (3). The King of France himself, though he had little reason to be sorry, gave him Marks of his Esteem, by ordering a solemn Service to be celebrated at Paris, at which he was pleased to be present in Person. Prince Edward left but one legitimate Son, about ten Years old, and two natural Sons, who made no great Figure in History (4).

The English were the more sensible of their late loss, as it was soon followed by a fresh occasion of Sorrow. The King recalled to Court those that were removed from his Person. Peter de la Mare, Speaker of the House of Commons (5), who, in presenting the above-mentioned Petition to the King, had spoken a little too freely against Alice Pierce, was, at her Solicitation, confined in Nottingham-Castle. The Duke of Lancaster resumed his old Post, and all the other Ministers were restored to their former Offices. However, though he gave the Duke of Lancaster this express Testimony of his Affection and Confidence, Edward would not give him occasion to expect, he designed him for his Successor. On the contrary, to prevent all Disputes, after his Death about the Succession, he created Richard his Grandson [Duke of Cornwall] and Earl of Chester, and presently after, conferred on him the Title of Prince of Wales (6). But not content with discovering his Intention, he caused all the Nobility to take their Oath to him, as to the Heir Apparent of the Crown; finally, for fear his Uncles might entertain hopes of ascending the Throne to his Prejudice, he was pleased to put him as it were in possession of the Rank he designed him for, by causing him to take Place of them in all Publick Solemnities. Thus did that wise Prince take Measures to prevent the Difficulties, which might arise after his death in his Family, concerning the Succession; pleasing himself withal in honoring the Memory of a Son he had tenderly loved, and perfectly esteemed, by doing Justice to young Richard (7).

Whilst these things were transacting at Court, John Wickliff, Doctor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, began to publish his Belief upon several Articles of Religion, wherein he differed from the common Doctrine. Pope Gregory XI, being informed of it, condemned some of his Tenets, and commanded the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of London, to oblige him to subscribe the Condemnation, and in case of refusal, to summon him to Rome. It was not easy to execute this Commission. Wickliff had now many Followers in the Kingdom, and for Protector, the Duke of Lancaster, whose Authority was very little inferior to the King's. Nevertheless, to obey the Pope's Order, the Archbishop held a Synod at St. Paul's at London, and cited Wickliff to appear. Accordingly, he appeared, accompanied by the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Percy, Marshal of England, who believed their Presence necessary to protect him. After he had taken his Place, according to his Rank, and been interrogated by the Bishop of London, he would have answered sitting, and thereby gave occasion for a great Dispute. The Bishop insisted upon his standing, and being uncovered, and the Duke of Lancaster pretended, Wickliff was there only as Doctor, to give his Vote and Opinion, and not as a Party accused. The Contest grew so high, that the Duke of Lancaster proceeded to Threats, and gave the Bishop very hard Words. Whereupon the People that were present, thinking the Bishop in danger, took his Part with such Heat and Noise, that the Duke and Earl Marshal thought fit to withdraw, and take Wickliff with them. Their withdrawing appeared not the Tumult. Some Incendiaries spread a Report, that at the Instance of the Duke of Lancaster, it was moved that Day to the King in Council, to put down the Office of Lord Mayor, take away the City Privileges, and reduce London under the Jurisdiction of the Earl Marshal. This was sufficient to enrage the People. They ran immediately to the Marshalsea, and freed all the Prisoners. But they did not stop there. The Martinists, whose Number continually increased, posted to the Duke of Lancaster's Palace in the Savoy, and missing his Person, plundered the House, and dragged his Arms along the Streets. The Duke was so provoked at this Affront, that he could not be pacified but by the removal of the Mayor (8) and Aldermen, whom he accused of not using their Authority to restrain the Seditions.

To return to Wickliff. The Bishops being met a second time, the Doctor declared before them his Sentiments concerning the Sacrament of the Eucharist, explaining the Eating of the Body of Christ, much in the same manner as Berengarius had done before him. Though his opinion was contrary to the Doctrine of the Church in those Days, the Bishops not daring to proceed rigorously against him, were contented with imposing him Silence. It is said, he promised to obey, but however, the Dispute was revived in the following Reign.

Let us conclude this Reign with Edward's last publick Action, who, in an Assembly of the Knights-Companions of the Garter at Windsor, conferred that Order on Richard his Grandson. This was the only Honour he could yet give him, after declaring him his Successor. Shortly after, this great Prince, who was now indisposed, fell so dangerously ill, that his Death was believed to approach. Before he left the World, he had the mortification to see the World leave him. Alice his Favourite

(2) He died of a Fever, June 8, 1376, and by his Will disposed of his Body to be buried in the Cathedral of the Trinity at Canterbury. Over his Grave is erected a stately Monument of Marble, with his Portraiture thereon of Copper. The ends and sides are garnished with Eucuthrons also of Copper, enameled with his Arms and Devices, and supercharged with the Words Huonius et Job dies. On an Iron Bar over the Tomb, are placed the Helmet and Crest, Coat of Mail and Gantelets, and (on a Pillar near thereto) his Shield of Arms richly diapered with Gold, all which he is said to have used in Battle. On a Pillar of Brass round the Monument is circumscribed this French Epitaph, "Cy gist le noble Prince Monseigneur Edward, dunt sire 'du treu sieur Roy Edward tiers, pais Prince d'Aquitaine & de Gales, Duc de Cornouaille & Comte de Chester, qui morut, en la feste de St. Jean le 11111 jour de Juin, l'an de grace mil trois cens Septante sixme, l'ame de St. Dieu est mercy Amen." On the South-side, at the Foot, and at the North-side of the Tomb, are Verba.

(3) Walling says, With him died the last of the English, during whose Life they dreaded no Invasion, nor feared to encounter any Enemy. He never undertook an Expedition without Conquest, never formed a Siege without carrying the Place, &c. p. 190.

(4) His natural Sons were: 1. Sir John Swinford, of whom there is no other mention than of his Name. 2. Sir Roger de Clarendon, so named probably from the Place of his Birth. He was made one of the Knights of the Chamber to Richard II, who granted him one hundred Pounds per Annum during Life. He was attainted in the Reign of Henry IV, and is thought to be the Ancestor of a Family of the Name in Essex. He bore, Dr. on a bend Sable, the three Orbs-Pendants argent, the eighth traversed through as many Scales of the fish. Sandif. General, p. 139. Besides Prince Richard, and the two natural Children here mentioned, it is certain that Prince Edward had a Daughter, though she is not mentioned by any of our Historians. She was married to Walter de Lincoln, Count de Ligny, and de St. Pol. All this appears from a Challenge sent by that Count to Henry IV. King of England, in which are these Words—"Confessant l'amour, et consideration, que j'ayove par devers treu et püssant Prince Richard Roy d'Angleterre, chapel de son oncle le Roi Edward tiers." Walling, Vol. I. p. 124.

(5) He was not Speaker, it seems, though Walling says it by mistake, but a considerable Knight of Hampshire both for Prudence and Eloquence. He was continued till the beginning of the next Regn.

1377. who managed him in his Sickness, suffered very few to come into his Room. When the law he was dying, he seized every Thing of Value he could find, even to the Rings on his Finger, and withdrew. His Courtiers and Chaplains showed no less Ingratitude. They all deserted him, without vouchsafing to warn him of the little time he had to live, and of the Account he was shortly to give of his Actions to God. There was only one single Priest, who accidentally seeing him forsaken in his last Agonies, came near the Bed to comfort him. He addressed to him some Exhortations, to which the dying King endeavoured to reply; but his Words were not articulate enough to be understood. The only Word distinctly pronounced, was the Name of Christ, just as he fetched his last Breath. Thus died this illustrious Prince at Shene, (now Richmond), in the Sixty-fifth Year of his Age, and the Fifty-first of his Reign (1).

Death of Edward.

His Character.

After relating the principal Actions of Edward III. in the History of his Reign, it will be necessary, in order to complete the Character of this famous Prince, to give some account of his Person, and Accomplishments of Body and Mind. He was very tall, but well-shaped, and of so noble and majestic an Aspect, that his very Looks commanded Respect and Veneration. Affable and obliging to the Good, but inexorable to the Bad; there are few Princes to be met with in History, in whom were so well mixed the Duties of a Sovereign with those of an honest Man, and a good Christian; though in this last Respect, his Conduct was not altogether blameless. His Conversation was easy, and always accompanied with Gravity and Discretion. Friend of the Poor, the Fatherless, the Widow, and all who were unhappily fallen into Misfortune; he made it his Business to procure them some Comfort in their Affliction. Never had King before him bestowed Honours and Rewards with more Judgment, and greater Regard to true Merit. Though his Valour was acknowledged and admired by all the World, it never made him Proud. Never did he show greater Signs of Humility, than in the Course of his Victories, which he constantly ascribed to the sole Protection of Heaven. He knew how to maintain the Prerogatives of the Crown, without encroaching on the Privileges of the People. In all the former Reigns, there had not been enacted so many advantageous Statutes to the Nation, as in this. Edward always agreeing with the August Body of the Nation's Representatives, made that Harmony instrumental to curb the Designs of the Court of Rome, which never dared to quarrel with him. The Glory of the Prince of Wales his Son, added a new Lustre to his own; and his constant Union with his Queen, increased his Happiness. As he was never too elate in Prosperity, so in Adversity he was never too much dejected. His Moderation appeared no less in his Loss of the Provinces, that had cost him so much Toil and Treasure, than in his Victories, which had gained him the Possession. In a word, he might be reckoned an accomplished Prince, if his Ambition had not caused him to break, in a dishonourable manner, the Peace made with Scotland, in order to dispossess a minor King, who besides was his Brother-in-law. Some add likewise the Rupture with France, and his Pretensions to the Crown, of that Kingdom, which they term extravagant, and wholly ascribe to an ambitious Motive. The following Dissertation will help the Reader to judge of this Conduct. As to his Weakness in falling in Love in his old Age, with Alice Pierce, that Blemish is much lessened by the many noble Qualities which rendered him so Praised-worthy. One might in some measure excuse him, by saying, he considered this Passion, at first, as an Amusement only, to divert him in his Troubles; and knowing little of Love in his youthful Days, took not sufficient care to keep himself from it in his old Age (2).

Philippa of Hainault, his Queen, brought him twelve Children, some of whom died before him. Edward Prince of Wales, his eldest Son, left but one Son, who ascended the Throne after his Grandfather. William, his second Son, died an Infant (3). Lionel, Duke of Clarence, who ended his Days in Italy, left only a Daughter called Philippa, by his first Wife, an Irish Lady (4). John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was twice married, in his Father's Life-time, and had Children, of whom I shall have occasion to speak in the following Reigns. Edward's fifth Son was Edmund, surnamed Langley, the Place of his Birth. He was created Earl of Cambridge by the King his Father, and afterwards Duke of York, in the Reign of Richard II. his Nephew. William, surnamed Windsoer, died young (5). Thomas of Woodstock, the seventh Son, was made Duke of Buckingham by Richard II. and afterwards Duke of Glocester.

Isabella, eldest Daughter of Edward, was married to Ingelram de Coucy Earl of Soissons (6). Joanna was first contracted to the Duke of Austria, and afterwards to Pedro (7) the Cruel, King of Castile, before he was King; and died at Bordeaux as she was going to Spain to consummate her Marriage. Blanch lived but few Years (8). Mary was married to John de Monfort, Duke of Bretagne, and died in 1363. Margaret was Wife to John Hastings, Earl of Pembroke (9).

(1) He died of the Shingles, on June 23. 1377. Rymor's Fed. Tom. 7. p. 257. Welling. Tyrrel. and lies buried in Westminster-Abbey, with this Epitaph upon his Tomb, according to the glowing Rhime of those Days.

(2) Among other publick Acts of Magnificence and Charity, King Edward rebuilt Windsoer Castle, of which Structure, the famous William of Wykeham was Surveyor: He also founded King's-Hall in Cambridge, now part of Trinity College; and the Collegiate Chapel of St. Stephen at Westminster, for a Dean, and twelve secular Canons. Stow's Ann. p. 277. Rymor's Fed. Tom. 5. p. 631.

(3) William of Burgh (the place of his Birth) born 1336, dying in his Childhood, was interred in the Cathedral of York.

(4) Elizabeth de Burgh, in whose Right he was created Earl of Ulster in Ireland. William de Burgh, her Father, married Maud, Daughter of Henry, Son of Edmund, second Son of Henry III.

(5) And was buried at Westminster. Where in the Chapel of St. Edward is to be seen a Tomb of grey Marble, on which lie the Figures of this William and his Sister Blanch de La Tour, carved in Alabastrer, in the Habit of the Time, each about a Foot and half long. The Fillet of Brass, containing their Epitaph, is torn away.

(6) Who was by Edward III. created Earl of Bedford, 1366. This Isabella was buried in the Church of the Friars Minores without Abigate, leaving Iselle Mary de Coucey, Wife of Robert de Barr, and Philippa de Coucy, Wife of Robert de Fore, Duke of Ireland, Marquis of Dublin, (a Title before unknown in England) and Earl of Oxford, who forsaking her, married one Lancaster, a Joan's Daughter, (as is reported) who came with King Richard II. his Wife out of Bohemia. He died at last in great war at Louvain, 1352; and his Corps was brought home, and interred at Earl's Colne in Essex.

(7) She was married by Proxy, and entitled Queen of Spain, but died of the Plague as soon as she came into Spain; so that the King her Spouse coming to meet her, to solemnize the Nuptials, accompanied her to the Church, only at her Request, in 1348. She was born in the Tower, 1335. All our Historians unanimously affirm, she was contracted to Alphonso XI. King of Castile; but that it was to his Son Pedro, surnamed the Cruel, is undoubtedly manifest from Rymor's Fed. Tom. 5. p. 475---476, 498---503, 604---607, 612, &c.

(8) She was called de la Four, because born in the Tower of London. She was buried in Westminster-Abbey, 1340, and her Figure of Alabastrer lies as above-mentioned in Note (5).

(9) This John Hastings being sent to raise the Siege of Roche, fell into the Hands of the Spaniards, and after two Years Captivity, was sold to a Nobleman of France, with whom agreeing for his Ransom, he was at his Departure poisoned at a Banquet, 1375, without life by this Wife, being the first Subject who followed the Example of King Edward III. in quartering Arms, as may be seen in his Effigie upon the North-side of Edward's III. Tomb; upon which he bears quarterly, Or, a March Gules, by the Name of Hastings; and, Barry of twelve pieces Argent and Azure, an Orle of eight Marlets Gules, being Fuente, impaling, France fene and England quarterly. Somerset. General. p. 186.

By a Charter-Mint to the Abbot of Reading, it seems that there was not any greater Piece coined, till after the twelfth Year of Edward III. than a Penny. For the Charter runs thus: Rex dilecti filii Thomas de Flute custodi Cambii nostri Londoni: Cum per Custum nostrum consueverimus cunctis nobis in Christi Abbatibus & Monachis de Reading good & ipe Successores in perpetuum habebant unum Monasterium de eorum pro Forde, pro moneta apud dictum Locum de Reading faciendis, de Impressione & Circumscriptura quod distat. Abbas de Reading, &c. The old Standard or Sterling of twenty three Carats, three Grains and a half fine, and half a Grain alloy. And for the Silver Coins, the old Sterling of eleven Ounces, two penny Weight fine, and eighteen Penny Weight alloy. The same in 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st of his Reign. In the thirteenth Year, every Pound Weight of Gold of this Standard, was to be coined into fifty Florences, at six Shillings a-piece, which made an Unflawed, Master and Worker. These Florences were so called from the Florentines, who (in the Year 1252) first minted such Pieces; so that Florence was generally used all over Europe, for the chief Gold Coin, as it is now for the best Silver. Fobius calls the Florence, a Penny, the Hain-Florence, a Half-penny, and the Quarter, a Farthing, of Gold. And their words are often met with in old Histories and Accounts, applied to several.

of wonder than Imitation (1). Some pretend that Pharamond the first King of the Franks, decreed by an express Law that the Females should not succeed to the Crown, which has ever since been inviolate. Others attribute this Law to Clovis. Mezerai pretends the Succession of the Males to the Crown of France was not established by a written Law, but by an inviolable Custom. This Confusion of Ideas which makes the Salic Law to be considered, one while as a Law of Nature, another while as a positive and express Law, and sometimes as a mere Custom, renders this Matter obscure, which I shall endeavour to clear, in order to give the Reader a true notion of the famous Contest between the two Kings.

Before the Franks settled in that part of Gaul, they have so long possessed, they were dispersed by Troops, in Germany and the Low-Countries, from whence they received several Names, according to the different Parts they inhabited. Some were called Salians, from the River Sala which ran through the Country (2). Others were distinguished by the Names of Chamavi, Catti, Attuarii, Ripuarii, or Rithari. Each of these Colonies had Laws, common, no doubt, to all the Franks, and probably particular ones too. The Laws of the Salians and Ripuarii are still extant. Among the Salian Laws we find this:

This Law, as it is easy to observe, concerns private Inheritances, and the Title de Alodia, under which it is placed, puts it out of dispute. Accordingly this is the Opinion of numberless Authors as well French as others, whose Names it would be needless to repeat. Mezerai was doubtless of the same Opinion, since he said, the Succession of the Males to the Crown was not established by any written Law. All that can be alleged with any Plausibility, by those who ground the Exclusion of the Females upon the above-mentioned Paragraph of the Salian Law, is, that the Succession to the Crown is included in the Law, which settled the Succession to the Inheritances of the noble Families. This Opinion is also embraced by Father Daniel in his History of France. He pretends, that the Rule, concerning the Succession to the Crown, is contained in that particular Article of the Salian or Salic Law, which includes all the Laws of the Salian Franks. What this able Historian says, in the Reign of Clovis, being of great Service to clear up this Point, I shall transcribe Part of it here, in order to save the Reader the Trouble of consulting him.

"It was then, probably, that Clovis published the famous Salic Law. I am sensible most of our Historians ascribe the Honour of it to Pharamond; but I follow here the Opinion of one of our best Critics, [Hadr. de Valois.]

"Many speak and hear of this Law without knowing what it is. It is a common Notion, that it concerns solely or chiefly the Succession of the Males to the Crown of France, by determining the Qualifications of those who may put in their Claim. This Notion is wrong in several Respects. Of the seventy two Articles, this Law consists of (3), there are but three or four Lines of the sixty second relating to this Point. Besides, they do not particularly concern the Succession of the Males to the Crown; but belong in general to all the Noble Families, whose Rights they regulate as well as those of the Royal Family. The Words run thus: As for the SALIC LAND, no part shall descend to the FEMALE, but all shall go to the MALE.

"By Salic Land is meant the Lands of the Nobles of the Nation, and moreover according to some, the Lands of Conquest, such were almost all those of the French Monarchy on this Side the Rhine. What has chiefly occasioned this popular Notion, was the great Dispute formerly between Philip de Valois and Edward III. King of England.--- Besides this famous Contest, the little Use made of this Law at present, which is seldom cited by our Lawyers upon other Accounts, was the reason of this common Perfection of its being thus limited. But in reality, it contained numberless Regulations concerning all Sorts of matters.

"I am apt to believe, what we now have of the Salic Law, is only an Abstract of a larger Code, abridged on purpose, that the People and Judges might more easily learn the Substance and principal Points. What makes me believe this, is, that in the present Book of the Salic Law, the Salic Law itself, is quoted with certain Forms not to be found in that Book.--- And this moreover leaves no room to question that it was at first composed in the Language of the Franks, and afterwards the Abstract translated into Latin for the use of the Gauls, to whom it was to be common in several Articles, with the Franks. This is the Abstract or Abridgment that has been transmitted to us.

Thus we have three different Opinions, given by three learned Critics concerning the Salic Law, the Law I mean which renders Women incapable of succeeding to the Crown. Bignon says, it is a Law of Nature which ought to be common to all Nations. According to Father Daniel, by the Salic Law we are to understand, an Abridgment of the Salian Laws, published by Clovis. As for the particular Law settling the Succession to the Crown of France, he pretends it is a mere Chimera, a vulgar Error, and adds, without alleging however any Proof, that the Exclusion of the Females with respect to the Crown, derives its whole Force from that particular Passage of the Salic Code (4), which settles the Inheritance of the Noble Families, and consequently, in his opinion, the Inheritance of the Family Royal, that is, of the Crown. According to Mezerai, by the Salic Law, or the Law that settles the Succession, is meant, not a written Law, but an inviolable Custom, which is instead of a Law. To give a distinct Notion of this Matter, I shall examine these three Opinions, and show the Objections they are liable to.

First, as to the Opinion that supposes the Salic Law, or which is the same Thing, the Exclusion of the Female, and their Descendants from the Succession to the Crown, to be a Law of Nature, I own, it might with some Reason, be maintained, that Nature requires States and Kingdoms to be governed by Men, if the Salic Law extended no further; but since it reaches to the Exclusion of the Male-Heirs of the Women of the Royal Family, methinks Nature does not appear in that Extension. In the next Place, if the Salic Law was a Law of Nature, it would be practised in all States, or at least the Exceptions, if any, would be but few. But here we find just the contrary. Of all the independent Kingdoms of Europe, established by the northern Nations, France alone follows this pretended Law of Nature. All the other States, Spain, Portugal, Naples, Sicily, Bohemia, Hungary, Sweden, Denmark, England, Scotland, admit of the Female Succession. Only France then must be said to follow Nature, and all the rest of the States to deviate from her Law, which to me seems absurd. Wherefore in the third Place, the Salic Law has all along been deemed, as it is at present, a Law peculiar to France; and we do not find that Philip le Long, or Philip de Valois ever pretended to urge it, upon any other foot.

As for Father Daniel's Opinion, whatever Effect I may have for his History, which I take to be the best of all the French Histories, I cannot forbear saying, it is not only groundless, but improbable. It is easy to demonstrate, that the Paragraph of the Salic Code, on which he grounds the Exclusion of the Females, and their Descendants, has no manner of relation to the Succession of the Crown, as will appear, if the whole Title under which it is placed, be but considered. It is the 62d, entitled, de Alodia, which settles the Inheritance of the Alodial Lands. But first, it must be observed, that Alodial Lands, were Lands of Inheritance, not held of any other Lord. This distinguishes them from those termed Beneficia, which were distributed among the Nobles, on condition of personally serving the State upon certain occasions, which Women were incapable of. These were the Lands called Terra Salica, because they were considered, as belonging properly to the collective Body of the Nation, and were held by private Persons, on the sole Condition of serving the State. This being supposed, the whole Title of the Salic Law, where the Paragraph is inserted, runs thus:

TIT. 62. DE ALODE.

"S. quis homo mortuus fuerit, & filios non dimiserit, ^{De Cange} ^{Autist.}

(1) One may justly say, there is no Beginning or End of the Salic Law, for it is a Law of Nature born with Men, and not written, as Arifstote observes. The Law of Nature and Nations is not written. Bignon l. 3. Rapin.
(2) There are a dozen different Opinions about the Etymology of the Word Salic. Thirt from the Salians, whose Name is taken from the River Sala, seems to me the most probable. See Linnæus de Jure Imp. Roman. Germ. l. 1. c. 2. Rapin.
(3) Some Editors have none, some less, Rapin.
(4) Rapin, in expressing here Father Daniel's Opinion, seems to make use of too strong Terms; for it is plain, from that Author's own Words, that he makes the Salic Law receive part of its Force from ancient Custom, which he even calls invincible.

" si Pater aut Mater superfuierint ipsi, in Hæreditatem Succedant.
" 2. Si Pater aut Mater non superfuierint & Fratres vel
" Sorores reliquerint, ipsi Hæreditatem obtineant.
" 3. Quod si nec ipsi fuerint, Sorores patris in Hæredi-" tatem Succedant.
" 4. Si vero Sorores patris non extiterint, Sorores matris
" ejus Hæreditatem sibi vendicent.
" 5. Si autem nulli horum fuerint, quicumque proximi-
" ores fuerint de paterna generatione, ipsi in Hæreditatem
" Succedant.
" 6. De Tetra autem Salica, nulla Portio Hæreditatis
" mulieri veniat, sed ad virilem Sexum tota Terræ Hæ-
" reditas perveniat."

Hence it appears, I. That the Salic Lands were Alodial like the other, that is, were the real Patrimony of the Possessor, otherwise they would not have been placed here. II. That the design of the sixth Paragraph was to distinguish the Salic, from the common Alodial, Lands, that the former were liable to military Service, which Women could not perform. But by reason, the sense of the sixth Paragraph must, I think, be strangely wrested, to extend it to the Succession of the Crown, the most that can be pretended, is, that the King's own Demesnes were subject to this Law.

But, more fully to show, this Article concerns not the Succession to the Crown, it must be remarked, there are two original Editions of the Salic Law, one procured by Herald, the other by Fr. Pitheou, and in the latter, this sixth Article of Title 62, is imperfect, there being no more than what is inserted above. But in the other Edition, the Paragraph runs in this manner :

De Terra vero Salica in mulierem nulla portio Hæreditatis transit, sed hoc virilis Sexus acquirit, hoc est, Filij in Hæreditate succedunt. Sed ubi inter Nepotes & Pronepotes, post longum Tempus, de Alode Terra contentio suscitatur, tunc non per stirpes, sed per capita dividantur.

I do not see, considering the whole Paragraph, how it can with the least shadow of Reason, be applied to the Succession of the Crown.

To this may be added, that very probably, when the Salic Law was made, the Franks had not yet a King. We not only see no sign of any such Thing in the several Articles of this Law, but moreover find in the Preambles, what makes it believed, the Franks were not subject to a Sovereign Power.

This is the Beginning of the Salic Law, according to Herald's Edition.

Anno ab Incarnatione Domini nostri Jesu Christi DCCXCVIII, Dominus Carolus Rex Francorum inchoatus, hunc Libellum Tractatus Legis Salicæ scribere jussit.

What likelihood is there, that, if the Authors of these Prefaces were of Opinion, the Franks had a King, when the Salic Law was made, they should not have mentioned him? For as to the Abstract of the Chronicle, it is a separate Piece, added by the Author of the last Preface, as treating of the same Subject. But if the Franks had not a King, how can the sixth Paragraph of the sixty second Title be applicable to the Succession of the Crown of France?

Another Objection to Father Daniel's Opinion is this: Supposing the Article, De Terra vero Salica, concerned the Succession to the Crown, as well as private Inheritances; if it be true, that this Law was abrogated under the third Race of the Kings of France, with respect to the Salic Lands or great Fiefs, it may, I think, be inferred, that it was also annulled with regard to the Crown. But the thing speaks of itself, since it cannot be denied that the Dukedoms, Earldoms, in a word, all the great Fiefs of the Crown, descended to the Females. Normandy, Guienne, Pontibeu, and Montrevil, fell to the Kings of England by the Women. It was the same with the Earldom of Tholouse, Provence, and Bretagne. The Succession of the Earldom of Flanders always devolved to the next Heir, without any Preference of Sex, since the time of Charles the Bald. All these Examples actually subsisted at the time of Lewis Hutin's Death, when the Salic Law began for the first time to be urged in favour of the Males. There were large Portions of the Salic Lands fallen to Women, purely by Right of Inheritance. Where was then the Observance of the Article, De Terra vero Salica nulla Portio ad mulierem transit?

There seems to me to be but two Ways of answering this Objection. First, by saying the Salic Lands, or great Fiefs of the Crown, descended to the Women, only when there was no Male-Heir in the Family. But this Reply has no Foundation. Besides what has been said concerning the Earldom of Flanders, in the very time of Philip de Valois, Artois was adjudged to Maud, to the Prejudice of Robert de Artois Grandson by his Father of the last Duke; and the Duchy of Bretagne, to the Wife of Charles de Blais, though Earl Montfort, Brother of the late Duke, was alive. But, supposing this Law was not annulled when Hugh Capet came to the Crown, it was at least abrogated by that Prince, in granting in Fee to the Nobility the great Fiefs, without excluding the Females.

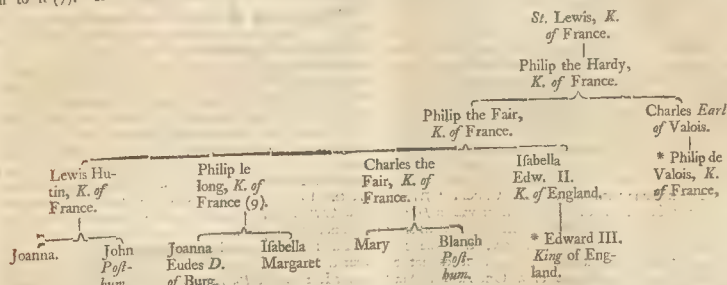

The other way of answering the Objection, is by asserting, that though the Law was repealed as to the Salic Lands, it was not so with regard to the Succession of the Crown, where it was always inviolable. But how can a Law be supposed to be abrogated in the undoubted Sense of the Words, and remain in Force in a disputable Sense, which is taken for granted without the least Proof? Besides, I shall make appear hereafter, there had never been any Occasion to break it.

A third Objection against Father Daniel's Opinion, may be taken from his own Preface to the History of France. This able Historian maintains, Article III, that the Crown, after being Hereditary in the first Race, became Elcive in the second, and was Hereditary in the third, only by way of Association practised by the first Kings of that Race, from Hugh Capet to Philip Augustus. If so, where shall we find the Observance of the Salic Law, with respect to the Crown, from Pepin the Short to Lewis VIII? How

Nor (1). Besides, from Gottron's believing it in his Power, to leave his Succession entire to Childbert II., without giving any share to Clotaire II., who it seems his Nephew, and Childbert's Brother (2); it may, it seems be inferred, that he did not look upon himself as bound by any Law, and that there was not then any settled Rule with respect to the Succession (3). It will be said perhaps, that in appointing Childbert, the eldest of the two Brothers, for his Successor, he only followed the Disposition of the Law or Custom; but this Objection is groundless (4). The whole History of the first Race plainly shows, the eldest had no Privilege, and that the Kingdoms, of which the French Monarchy there consisted, were always divided among the Brothers (5). But be that as it will, it is not sufficient to show, that Gottron did a Thing agreeable to the pretended Disposition of the Sacred Law or Custom, it must also be proved, that he did it with Intention to observe that Custom or Law, which I think impossible (6). It would be quite another thing, if the Law was perfectly known, or the Custom undeniably established by former Precedents; which might give occasion to suppose Gottron designed to conform himself to it (7). If a Man examines what passed during the first Race, with respect to the Succession, he will find nothing fixed or settled upon that Head; and that Force and Arms, had a greater Share in it than Laws. This is to say, that it is even doubtful, according to Father Daniel, whether the Children were to be preferred to the Brothers, and that this Question was not fully decided till long after the beginning of the second Race (8). It is evident then, from what has been said, that the Opinion that there was in France, before the Reign of Philip le Long, a Law or Custom excluding the Daughters from the Succession to the Crown, cannot be supported by any certain Testimony, or undeniable Matter of Fact.

Having shown what we are to understand by the Salic Law, of which so many People talk, without having just Notion of the Thing, it will be necessary, in order fully to clear this Matter, to make appear how the Practice of this Law was established in France. But for the better Understanding of this, it will be proper to set before the Reader the following Part of the Genealogy of the Kings of France, which will serve likewise to show the Occasion of the Dispute between Edward and Philip de Valois.

Lewis Hutin dying in 1316 left by Clément of Burgundy his Wife only one Daughter, an Infant called Yolanna. But as his Queen was big with Child, the Crown was not disposed of till she was delivered. The Reason of this delay was, because, if the Queen was delivered of a Son, he was to succeed his Father, not by virtue of the Salic Law, but by a Law common to all States, according to which the Males have always the Preference to the Females of the same degree. Till the Queen's delivery, Philip le Long, the eldest of the deceased King's two Brothers, was appointed Regent. I say, appointed, in the Words of Father Daniel, who does not acquaint us by whom he was appointed: Philip was then at Lyon, busy in procuring a Conclave for the Election of a new Pope. This was the Reason he could not come to Paris, till three Weeks after the death of the King his Brother. He found there a Party already formed against him, at the Head of which was Charles Earl of Valois his Uncle, who intended to dispute the Regency with him, and was in possession of the Louvre. But Philip, at his Arrival, found means to dislodge him. The next day, he assembled the Parliament, and by the unanimous Consent of the Lords and Knights there present, the Regency was adjudged to him for eighteen Years, in case the Queen was delivered of a Son.

Mean times, as the Queen might chance to have a Daughter, Eudie Duke of Burgundy, Uncle by the Mother's Side to Joanna, Daughter of the late King, was preparing to profecture his Niece's Right. At length, the Queen was brought to bed of a Prince, who was called John, and lived but a few Days. Then Philip, grounding his Claim upon the Salic Law, pretended the Crown was fallen to him. As he had a powerful Party, and was unwilling to have his Title questioned, he repaired to Rheims, in order to be crowned. But the Duke of Burgundy opposed the Coronation, with a Protection, in the Presence of the Peers, to maintain Joanna's Right, to whom he pretended the Crown belonged, both by natural and civil Law; and at least the Coronation ought not to be performed, before the Pretensions of the young Princefs were duly examined. Though the Earl of Valois had attended Philip to Rheims, he was known to be a Friend of the Duke of Burgundy's. On the other hand, Charles Earl of Marche, the King's own Brother, being of the fame Party, left Rheims the Morning before the Solemnity. If the Salic Law could be proved to be acknowledged and admitted before that time, I confess, the opposition of these Princeps would be of no great weight. But as that Proof is very difficult, as I have before shewn, it may be inferred from the opposition of

(a) Rapin is mistaken in making Gilbert to be eldest Brother of Glaire II. They were only Cousin Germans, Sons of two Brothers; the first of Siebert, King of Auftrafia; and the other of Chulperic, Brother of Neufria. So that his Remark, that the eldest had no Privilege, &c. is not to the purpose here.

(3) Does not the contrary seem fair to be inferred from this Prince's Conduct, that he was ~~not~~ otherwise it is incredible that he should not including the Females from the Crown, and knew the Succession to be so settled in an inviolable manner; and what lay in his Power, to leave his Dominions to his only beloved Daughter?

(5) Rapin did not seem to be of the Opinion, that the Succession was divided among all the Brothers, in his Diffinition on the Government of

(6) As Gentian himself succeeded to part of his Brother's Succession, in Exclusion of his three Nieces Gentian's Daughters, it is probable, that he adopted his Nephew in Exclusion of his Daughter, in consequence of the same Law or Custom by which he was preferred to his

(7) We have for it the Authority of Agatbi, who speaks of it in explicit Terms; and the Treaty between Gontran and Collocote, which is supposed, and made the Foundation of their Agreement. Besides, this Law or Custom is to be considered as unquestionably established, before Gontran disposed of his Dominions, in prejudice of his own Daughter, since there were three Examples in fifteen Years: 1. The Exclusion of Theobald's Sisters in 1100: 2. Of Childbert's two Daughters in 1138: 3. Of Chester's three Daughters in 1170.

the Princes of the Blood themselves, and contrary to their own Interests, that this Law passed not then for incontestable.

de France.

The Duke of Burgundy's Protestation, and Prince Charles's Retreat, made Philip so uneasy, that he ordered the Gates of Rheims to be shut during the Ceremony of the Coronation, for fear of interruption, or that other Peers might absent themselves. A few days after, he held an Assembly at Paris, where were present a great number of Nobles, almost all the Prelates, the most considerable Burgesses of Paris, and the University. It was this Assembly that examined the Laws of the State; decided, that the Females were incapable of succeeding to the Crown; and approved and confirmed the King's Coronation. It might be demanded, whether such an Assembly had Power to make a decision of this Nature; but since the French Nation has thought fit to receive it, it is needless to insist upon that. I shall only observe, that it was now almost nine hundred Years since the establishment of the Monarchy, and this the first time it was expressly decided in France, that the Daughters were incapable of succeeding to the Crown.

Notwithstanding this decision, Queen Clemence, Widow of the late King, the Earl of March, the King's Brother, the Earl of Valois his Uncle, the Duke of Burgundy Prince of the Blood, and their Adherents, did not fail to show a dissatisfaction, at seeing Philip on the Throne. This created uneasiness in the new King, who, to free himself from it, found means to gain the Duke of Burgundy, the Head of the Party, by giving him his eldest Daughter in Marriage, with the Earldom of Burgundy for her Portion. The Duke being thus gained, the Party dispersed, and the Salic Law passed, from thenceforward, for a Law as ancient as the Monarchy. But great care was taken to confound, as has been done ever since, the Salic Law in general, or the Collection of Salic Laws, with the pretended Salic Law in particular, which excluded the Daughters from succeeding to the Crown.

Philip le Long being dead, after a short Reign, and leaving only Daughters, Charles the Fair his Brother, mounted the Throne without opposition, to the Prejudice of his Nieces. This was a second decision in favour of the Males. From that time none ever thought of questioning the Authority of the Salic Law. Thus was established the observance of this famous Law in France, without its being yet known, whether Philip le Long, in urging it in support of his Pretensions, proceeded upon the sixth Paragraph of the 62d Title of the Salic Law, or upon inviolable Custom. What may be affirmed, is, that in those Days the French must have had very confused Notions concerning this Law, since even after its being incontestably acknowledged for authentic, the most learned cannot agree upon that Subject.

I come now to the famous Dispute between Philip of Valois and Edward III. Charles the Fair, who died February 1328, leaving no Male-Issue, and his Queen finding herself with Child, the same Rule was followed as was observed after the Death of Lewis Hutin. That is, the Crown was not disposed of, till the Queen's Delivery, who was seven Months gone with Child. But it was necessary to appoint a Regent, to take care of the Government in the mean while. Then it was that the great Contest about the Regency, arose between Edward III. Nephew, by his Mother, to Charles the Fair, and Philip Earl of Valois, Cousin German to the same Prince. This was an Affair of very great Consequence. Besides, that the Regency was to be long, in case the Queen was delivered of a Son, it was easy to foresee, that the Judgment given for the Regency, would be a strong Precedent for the Crown, if she happened to have a Daughter. For this reason the Affair was very warmly contested on both Sides, not before the States General, as some have affirmed without any Foundation, but before an Assembly of Great Men, purposely convened upon that occasion. Edward pleaded his being the next Male-Heir of the late King. Philip adhered to the Salic Law, which, according to him, excluded not only the Daughters, but also their Descendants, from the Succession to the Crown, and consequently from the Regency. Philip carried the Cause as to the Regency, and was afterwards crowned, upon the Queen's being delivered of a Daughter in April. As Edward endeavoured not to prosecute his Right till some Years after, the Question between them, was no longer concerning the Regency, but the Crown it self. All the French Historians call Edward's Pretensions chimerical; and the English, on their Part, exclaim against the Injustice that was done him. The Business therefore at present is to examine the Rights of both Parties, independently of the Events, and Philip's Possession. This will be the only means to enable us to judge, whether the War occasioned by this Affair, was just or unjust, or whether, as I believe, there were on both Sides, sufficient Reasons to justify the Attack and the Defence.

In order to have a clear Notion of this Matter, it must be considered, that the Point in question between the two Kings, was not, Whether there was any such thing as a Salic Law, excluding the Daughters from the Succession to the Crown of France? Whether the Law was real, or only imaginary, it was equally the Interest of both Kings to suppose it, since it was the sole Foundation of their respective Claims. Without this Law, the Crown would have indisputably belonged to Joanna Daughter of Lewis Hutin, and the two last Kings must have been reckoned Usurpers. Moreover, had there been no Salic Law, Philip and Edward would have been manifestly excluded by the Daughters of the three last Kings, Sons of Philip the Fair. The only Thing therefore was to know, whether the Salic Law was limited to the Persons of the Daughters, to exclude them from the Succession, or whether it extended to all their Posterity. This was a new Query, which had never been decided, because the same case had never happened since the beginning of the Monarchy. Philip maintained, that Edward could pretend to the Crown, but by Right of Representation, as Son of Isabella; and that representing only a Woman, he could not derive from his Mother, a Right which he had not. But Edward took care not to ground his Claim upon Representation. He insisted on the contrary, upon nearness of Blood; and affirmed, that the Crown was devolved to him, as the next Male-Heir capable of succeeding.

Indeed, it cannot be conceived what use he could have made of Representation, which serves only to put a distant Relation, in the Place of the Person represented. He had no occasion to be brought nearer, since he was Nephew of the late King, and Philip de Valois but Cousin-German. Accordingly, in all the Pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts concerning this Matter, there is not so much as one, where he alleges in his behalf, the Right of Representation, but always that of nearness of Blood. And yet almost all the French Authors that have writ on this Subject, have been pleased to combat this Chimera, and ground their Reasonings upon the Impertinency of this Representation, which, after all, was never urged by Edward. The English, for their Part, are fallen into the like Error, by strenuously opposing the Existence of the Salic Law, not considering, it was no less necessary for Edward than for Philip. So, it may be affirmed, both Sides have understood, and stated the Question wrong.

But, to prevent mistakes, and clear this Matter as much as possible, a Man must fancy himself contemporary with this Dispute, and consider that the point in Question was never decided. Each Party therefore was free, before the decision, to explain and comment upon the Salic Law, as he judged for his Purpose, without being liable to be taxed with Rashness. Whereas now it would be ridiculous to dispute upon the Interpretation of a Law acknowledged by the French, and admitted, as then explained by Philip, and which they have ever since followed.

This being supposed, the Business then, in order to decide this new Query, was, fully to understand the meaning of the Salic Law, concerning which there was reason, as I have shown, to doubt, whether it ever existed. But supposing its Existence, the Question was to be decided, either according to the Paragraph of the Salic Code, De Terra vero Salica, &c. which gave no Light into the Point in hand, or according to the inviolable Custom observed in France for nine hundred Years, though there had never been occasion to put it in practice. Upon which ever of these two Foundations a Man grounded a Judgment, he could not but meet great Difficulties. Could he say, that by the Paragraph De Terra Salica, it was plain, the Male-Issue of the Daughters, were to be excluded from the Succession to the Crown? Was it evident that this Law, so long disputed, with respect to the Salic Lands, and the Estates of the Nobles, had preserved its full Force with regard to the Crown? On the other hand, if a Man grounded his Judgment upon Custom, what Method could he take to know, whether it was the Intent of the first Establishers, whoever they were, to exclude from the Succession the Male-Heirs of the Daughters, as well as the Daughters themselves? He could have no Precedents or Examples to direct him, since the same case had never happened. It is therefore rashness, in my opinion, absolutely to decide now against either of the two contending Princes, and more so, peemptorily to pronounce the Pretensions of either to be extravagant. This is the more unjust, as they both supported their Claims by very specious Reasons, the Substance whereof I am going to relate; if so be, that Part of these Reasons have not since been fathered upon them.

Edward maintained, that what had hitherto been decided concerning the Salic Law, regarded only the Persons of the Daughters, and could not be extended to their Male-Issue, without proving it to be the Intent of the Law. But this was impossible, considering the time between its Establishment, and the first Occasion of putting it in Practice. That indeed, the Exclusion of the Daughters was built on very plausible Reasons, taken from the Weakness of their Sex, and the Temper of the French Nation, which would never venture to be governed by a Woman; but that these Reasons could not be alleged against their Sons. That formerly, among the Ostrogots of Italy, who observed the same Custom, there was a like Instance, which plainly showed, that the Exclusion of the Daughters might subsist without that of their Male-Heirs. That after the Death of Theodoric, Amalazontis, his Daughter, did not succeed him, because she was a Woman; however, that did not hinder Athalaric her Son, though an Infant, from being placed on the Throne of his Grandfather (1). He farther added, that the Salic Law was an extraordinary Law, contrary to the Law Civil and Natural, for which reason it was to be confined within just Bounds, rather than extended, as if the Women of the Royal Family were to be punished for some great Crime, which deservedly drew down Vengeance on all their Posterity. If the French believed Women unworthy or unfit to govern them, with all his Heart, he pretended not to oppose that Law. But what had the Princesses of the Blood done to deserve, that all their Posterity should suffer a Punishment, from which the Daughters of the Peers, and the other great Men of France were exempted, as well as their Descendants? Finally, in explaining the Salic Law, so as to deprive the Male-Issue of the Women of a natural Right, was to make a new Law, under colour of interpreting the old.

Philip replied, that Edward acknowledging the Authority of the Salic Law, was much mistaken in confining the Intent of that Law, to the hindering the Kingdom of France from being governed by a Woman. That there was another and no less essential End, namely, to prevent the Crown from devolving to Foreigners. That the French Nation had willingly submitted to Hugh Capet and his House, but never meant to subject themselves to other Families; and to receive a foreign King, a new Contract was necessary (2). That the Intent of the French manifestly appeared, in their not considering the Descendants of the Princesses of the Blood, as presumptive Heirs of the Crown (3). Consequently, it was not indifferently the next Male-Heir which was to succeed, but the next descended from Father to Son from Hugh Capet.

It is a strange thing, that among so many Authors who have writ of this famous Contest, not one, at least that I know of, except Father Daniel, rightly understood the State of the Question between the two Kings. They have all amused themselves with combating Chimeras, and making the Parties alledge Arguments nothing at all to the purpose, and sometimes even contrary to their real Interests. Some make Philip urge very strong Reasons against the Right of Representation, which it is certain Edward never meant to use. Others alledge for Edward the most plausible Arguments against the Salic Law, though it was evidently his Interest to support it. And therefore I am apt to believe, the Harangue Paulus Emilii puts into the mouth of Robert d'Artois, in Defence of Philip's Right, is a mere Invention of the Historian; since the Orator does not confine himself to the true Case, though in all Appearance, Robert d'Artois was not ignorant of the State of the Controversy. Paquier, though a great Civilian, and well versed in the History of France, and in short, all the Writers, as well English as French, are guilty of the same Error. As for Father Daniel, after truly stating the Case, and briefly relating the reasons of Philip de Valois, without giving his own Opinion, he makes Edward's Pretensions to be considered, in the Course of his History, as Chimerical (4).

This Case was never decided as to the Crown, but only with regard to the Regency. It cannot be denied, that in this Judgment, Philip had a great Advantage, for the Judges were all his Relations and Friends, and the Person who disputed the Regency with him, a Minor and Foreigner. Philip took for granted afterwards, in imitation of Philip le long, that the same Judgment which adjudged him the Regency, gave him a Right to be crowned, and by that the Question was really decided. He was so prejudiced in favour of his own Right, that he commanded the Hands and Feet of a Burgher of Compiègne to be cut off, for maintaining that Edward's Title was better than his. One cannot say what the Issue would have been, if the Decision of the Affair had been referred to the States of the Realm, as it was the Opinion of several, who believed that to be the only means of solidly establishing Philip's Right. All that can be affirmed is, that the Establishment of the Salic Law in favour of Philip le long, and its Confirmation by the Advancement of Charles the Fair, to the Throne, could not have prejudiced Edward. The sole Business was, either to limit the Salic Law to the Persons of the Daughters, or to extend it to all their Posterity, and this is what had never before been decided.

My Design in what I have said, as well concerning the Salic Law, as the Contest between the two Kings, was, I. To rectify most People's Notion concerning this Law. II. To show precisely wherein consisted the Dispute between the two Competitors. III. That this Affair had its Difficulties, and was not easily to be determined by Law. IV. Lastly, That the two Kings had each very plausible reasons, and consequently it was a just Matter of Process. And this is what I could not do in the Body of the History, without making too long a Digression. As the War, occasioned by this Quarrel was very lasting, and renewed by several of Edward's Successors, I thought it would not be unacceptable to the Reader to know the Origin and Foundation thereof. Nay this Quarrel may be said not to be yet ended, since from the Time of Edward III., the Kings of England have all along born, and still do bear the Title of Kings of France.

(1) There are some Writers, who not knowing that the Dispute between their Male-Issue, have alleged this Example in favour of Philip de Valois.

(2) It would perhaps be pretty difficult to prove this Engagement of the by the first Kings of the third Race, seems to argue, that they did not himself with saying, that it is very likely. Rapin.

(3) I question whether this can be affirmed with Certainty, with respect to the Time before the Reign of Philip le long. At least, it is very doubtful, with regard to the second Race. Rapin.

(4) It is certain, that Rapin, in asserting that all the French and English Authors understood not the State of the Question between the two Kings, was mistaken. For of the French, Vertot, in his Dissertation on the Salic Law, (which Rapin, it is plain, never saw) states the Case exactly as he does. So do likewise Bodin, De Hæreditatibus, and Le Guesclier. So also the famous Festouard; and of our Historians, Mortimer, 1594, Sec. It must indeed be owned, that some, after truly stating the Case, in other places alledge Arguments against the Salic Law, which evince, during Edward's Pretensions. Of this Father Daniel is a famous Instance. For after he had already said, "That the Salic Law was allowed on both sides; namely, that the Daughters could not succeed to the Crown, and therefore the Queen of England, though the late King's Sister, could not pretend to it. But the English Lawyers maintained, the next Person, where this defect of Sex was not found, ought, by name of Blood, to succeed, and upon this Title Edward founded his Pretensions." I say, after thus truly stating the Case, he says, in his Dissertation on the Antiquity and Author of the Salic Law, "If the English had not been persuaded of the Antiquity of this Law, they would not have failed to attack, more strongly than they did, this fundamental Principle of Philip's Right." What! Should they attack a Law, allowed by Edward as well as Philip? A Law, without which neither of them would have had any Pretensions to the Crown? It is in this inconsistent Manner that many, both French and English Historians, talk upon this Subject. See these things more largely discussed in Riccioli's Examination of L'abbé de Vertot's Dissertation on the Origin of the Salic Law.

Philip and Edward, was not about the Exclusion of the Women, but of the French Nation with the Family of Hugh Capet. The Affiliation practised much rely on this pretended Engagement, of which Father Daniel contents.

EDWARD III., having finished his glorious Life, it was naturally Richard his Grandson, that was to ascend the Throne, as representing the late Prince of Wales his Father. But though Edward himself had to ordered it, many People were apprehensive, the Execution of his last Will would meet with great Obstacles. Richard had three Uncles who might dispute the Crown with him, and support the Pretension if they would have urged it, with plausible and illufury Reasons. The young Prince could claim the Crown only by Right of Representation, of which there had been no Precedent at least with respect to the Crown, since the Norman Conquest. However lawful this Right might be with regard to private Persons, by the general Disposition of the Laws, it did not necessarily follow that it was incontestable concerning the Crown. In France, for Example, the Succession of the Kingdom was not regulated by the Laws of private Estates. In Spain, the Kings, who for a Century had been possessed of the Crown of Castile, were descended from a Prince that obtained it in Prejudice of his Nephews, Sons of his eldest Brother. Nay, a natural Son was then in actual Possession; though among private Persons, Bastards had no Right to the Inheritance of their Fathers. In Artois, the Aunt by the Judgment of the Peers of France, was preferred to the Nephew, who represented his Father. A quite contrary Decision of the same Court, with regard to Bretagne, had occasioned in that Dukedom a War, which at length was ended to the Advantage of the Uncle against the Niece, and wherein Edward himself had maintained the Right of the former. This was sufficient to afford the Duke of Lancaster, the eldest of the three Brothers, a very plausible Pretence, if he had intended to seize the Crown, as was suspected by the late Prince of Wales his Brother, the King his Father himself, and all England. To this may be added, that Richard's Youth, who was but in his cleventh Year, and the Expiration of the Truce with France, seemed to furnish the Duke with fresh Reasons to demand the Crown, which he was better able to defend than a Minor of eleven Years old. But on the other hand, though the Duke of Lancaster should have had such a Thought, he might have been diverted from it by the consideration of the Disposition of the English in favour of young Richard, whom the Memory of his illustrious Father rendered extremely dear to them, and for whom the King his Grandfather had designed the Crown. Whether this Consideration prevented his Uncles from taking Advantage of his Youth, or it was from a pure Motive of Moderation and Equity, far from intending to supplant him, they were the first to do him Homage. The Duke of Lancaster, who was filled in Holland, King of Castile, satisfied his Ambition with governing the State during Richard's Minority, and the Princes his Brothers were no less inclined than he, to perform their Father's last Will. So all Fears vanishing, Richard was crowned without Opposition, on the 16th of July, four and twenty Days after the Death of Edward (1).

All this happened whilst the English were employed in the King's - placing Richard on the Throne, as the most urgent Affair. Unhappy was the Situation. Mean time, there was neither Fleet nor Troops provided to repulse the Enemies. As the King was not of Age to govern the State himself, the Duke of Lancaster and the Earl of Cambridge his Uncles took the Administration of Affairs, till the meeting of the Parliament in October, but used with great Caution, the Authority they had assumed, for fear of breeding Prejudices against them, that might be detrimental to them in the approaching Parliament. The Duke of Lancaster was not beloved; he was accused of abusing his Power in the end of the late Reign, and treating the Subjects a little too haughtily. He had especially incurred the ill-will of the Londoners, by causing them to be punished for the Tumult raised on Wickliffe's Account. Though since the Death of the King his Father, he had been reconciled to the City (8), that Proceeding was considered only as the Effect of his Policy, Walslog.

all Differences between the Duke of Lancaster and them, to the young King, Matters were soon adjudged, Walf. p. 193.

and it was feared, he would assume his former Haughtiness, if entrusted with the Administration. As he knew very well what People thought of him, he behaved very respectfully, apprehensive as he was of being excluded from the Regency to which he aspired. But all his Precautions were not capable to prevent the Murmurs of the People, already prejudiced against him. The little care, the two Princes took to guard the Coasts, was openly complained of, without considering they had neither Fleet, nor Troops, nor Money, nor even any lawful Authority to raise extraordinary Forces. Another Accident helped very much to incense the People against them. The Scots having taken by Surprise the Castle of Roxborough, the Loss was ascribed to the Negligence of those, who governed the Realm (1).

The Parliament's first Care, which met in October (2), was to settle the Administration of the Government during the King's Minority. For that purpose, they appointed several Governours to the King, to take care of his Education, and ordered that his three Uncles should be Regents of the Kingdom; but joined with them some Bishops and Lay-Lords (3). This Precaution was founded on the Danger of trusting the Person and Affairs of a Minor King, to the sole Management of the nearest Relations, who in their Administration, might have Self-interested Views. This was a great Mortification to the three Princes, and particularly to the Duke of Lancaster, who had flattered himself with the Hopes of being sole Regent (4).

This Affair being finished, the Parliament granted the King a Subsidy (5), for the Maintenance of the War; but it was clogged with this Condition, (which plainly shewed, they were resolved to be upon their Guard during the Minority,) that the Money should be lodged in the Hands of Philip and Wauworth, two eminent Aldermen of London, who were ordered to take care, it should be expended only in repelling the French and Castilians in League against England. Moreover, it was declared, that the Subsidy granted the King, should not be drawn into a Precedent, but for the future, what should be necessary for maintaining his Household, and defraying the Charges of the War, should be supplied out of his ordinary Revenues. After this the Parliament admitted an Accusation against Alice Pierce, Favorite of the late King, who being convicted of several Misdemeanours (6), received a Sentence, whereby all her Estate was confiscated to the King's Use, and herself condemned to Banishment. But this Woman, who had an able and intriguing Head, quickly found means to be recalled by the King, and restored to her Estate (7). Before the Parliament broke up, Richard confirmed King John's two Charters, and gave his Assent to several Acts, relating to the Contests England had with the Court of Rome.

It was not without reason, that the Duke of Lancaster was hindered from having the sole Management of Affairs. This Prince was of a proud and haughty Temper, which suffered him not to have much regard for his Inferiors, particularly in Affairs where his Interest was concerned. Presently after the breaking up of the Parliament, he gave a Proof of his violent Temper by an Action, which shewed what he was capable of, if the whole Power had been lodged in his Hands. As he had a claim to the Kingdom of Castile, he thought it might be of some advantage to gain to his Interest the young Earl of Denia, a Castilian Lord, then at London. The Father of this young Earl, being taken at the Battle of Navarre by two English Knights, was brought into England, where he had remained several Years in the Custody of those who took him Prisoner. At length, by leaving his Son in Hostage, he obtained leave to return Home, where he died before his Ranfom was paid. The Duke of Lancaster hoping to make Friends in Castile by means of the young Captive Earl, so managed it, that the King ordered the two Knights to release him. But as there was no mention of the Ranfom, they concealed their Prisoner, and made him promise he would not discover himself. This Disobedience exasperating the Duke of Lancaster, he sent the two Knights to the Tower, from whence however they made their Escape, and took Refuge in the Church of Westminster. This Sanctuary was not capable of saving them. The Duke of Lancaster sending Soldiers into the Church (8) to bring them away, one of the Knights (9) was retaken, but the other (10) defending himself, was slain, with a Monk who too warmly took his Part. The Archbishop of Canterbury excommunicated all that were concerned in the Breach of the Church's Privileges; but the Duke's Authority prevented any farther Prosecution of the Affair. Sometime after, the King taking upon him to pay the Spanish Earl's Ranfom, it was discovered, to the People's great Admiration, that the young Lord, not to be forced to break his Promise, had all along attended, in a Footman's Habit, the Person to whom he had given his Word.

Mean time, the Duke of Lancaster, who was vexed to see the Money granted the King by the Parliament, in the Hands of two Citizens of London, promoted not the equipment of the Ships, for the defence of the Coasts. This affected Negligence occasioned many Complaints. But he pretended, he could not form any Project, left it should not be approved by those, who had the Management of the Money. In fine, he importuned the other Regents, that the two Aldermen were ordered to put into his Hands the Sums they were charged with. He promised for his Part, that the Coasts should be better guarded, and the Merchant Men protected. However, he still delayed a considerable time sending out a Fleet, because he expected from Bayonne some Ships which were to join those he equipped.

Whilst the Fleet was preparing, the Earls of Arundel (11) and Salisbury (12) had orders to go to Normandy, and take possession of Cherbourg, which the King of Navarre had promised to deliver to the English. They had scarce left the Coasts of England, when they were met by some Spanish Men of War, who fiercely attacked them (13), and did them some Damage. Notwithstanding this Obstacle, they put a Garrison into Cherbourg, which afforded the English an Inlet into Normandy, as Calais did into Picardy.

Before the Fleet, designed for the guard of the Coasts, was quite ready, one Mercer, a Scotch Pirate, seeing the English neglected the northern Seas, entered the Port of Scarborough, and carried away the Merchant Men that lay there. This Success inspiring him with greater hopes, he long cruised in those Seas, and took considerable Prizes. The Damage sustained by the Merchants on this occasion, caused fresh Complaints against the Duke of Lancaster, who so ill performed his Promise. Philip before-mentioned, full of Indignation to see the English Merchants exposed to the Ravages of this Pirate, undertook, at his own Expence, what the Duke neglected to do with the Publick Money. He went into some Ships, and with a thousand Soldiers, vented in quest of the Scotch Pirate, whom he defeated, and taking him Prisoner, returned in Triumph to London. This Action, which gained him the Applauses of the People, offended the Regents, who thought it of dangerous Consequence, to suffer a private Person to undertake a thing of that Nature, without the Government's Permission. But he made so good a De-Schism in the Church.

Walf. p. 137.
Fro. Hist. l. 2. c. 9.

The late Schism formed in the Church by the double Election of Urban VI. and Clement VII. employed the Parliament some time, which met in October 1378. France espoused the Cause of Clement, and perhaps that was the principal Reason of England's declaring for Urban. However, as the Matter is stated by the Friends of Clement themselves, it cannot be denied, that his Election was very irregular. The life of the Schism was this.

Life of the Schism.
Gregory XI. leaving Avignon, upon certain pretended Revelations, in order to reside at Rome, died March the 7th, 1378. Of the three and twenty Cardinals then in being, fix remained at Avignon, one was a Legate, and the sixteen others, of whom twelve were Frenchmen, and four Italians, were at Rome when Gregory died. These last being entered the Conclave, to proceed to the Election of a Pope, were greatly embarrassed. Their Intent was to chuse a Frenchman; but as they forelaw the People of Rome would oppose it, they resolved to give them a seeming Satisfaction, by pretending to elect an Italian. But they agreed first among themselves, that as soon as they were at full Liberty, they would chuse another, who should be the true Pope; a Project which could hardly fail of begetting a Schism. According to this Agreement, of which we could have no certainty, but by their own Confession, they elected the Archbishop of Bery, a Neapolitan, who assumed the Name of Urban VI. The Election was notified to all Christian Princes as Canonical, even by the Cardinals the Electors, and for some time they themselves acknowledged Urban for Head of the Church. And yet, whether in Consequence of their Agreement, or, as some affirm, because Urban treated them too haughtily, these same Cardinals leaving Rome on pretence of great heat, met at Anagnina, and elected one of the Cardinals of Avignon, who filled himself Clement VII. These two Elections by the same Persons, long employed the most noted Divines in Europe, and occasioned a Schism, which lasted above thirty Years. It ought not to seem strange, that it was so difficult to decide, which of the Popes was Head of the Church: It would have been much easier to find good Reasons to reject them both. However, the Schism divided all Christendom, each State declaring for one or other of the two Popes, not so much on account of the Right of the Parties, as for political Reasons. France, whose Interest it was that the Pope should reside at Avignon, joined with Clement, and for a contrary Reason, England thought it more advantageous to adhere to the Pope of Rome.

The Duke of Lancaster undertakes to reduce the Duke of Bretagne.
Fro. Hist. l. 1. c. 314.
Aft. Pub. VII. p. 197.

Whilst the two Pontiffs were darting their Spiritual Thunders against one another, the Duke of Lancaster equipped his Fleet, which had been so long preparing. His Design was not only to guard the Coasts as he had engaged: He had in view a more important Expedition, namely, to restore the Duke of Bretagne, dispossessed by the King of France, with the Connivance of the Lords of Bretagne, whom he had gained to his Interests. This unhappy Prince, seeing himself abandoned by most of his Subjects, came into England towards the end of Edward's Reign, to demand his Assistance; but losing that refuge by the Death of his Father-in-law, retired to the Earl of Flanders, his Relation and Ally. During his stay in that Country, a French Envoy, who was going to Scotland, being stopped on the way, by the Earl's Order, Charles pretended it was done by the Duke of Bretagne's Intigation, and insisted upon the Earl's dismissing him from his Court. The Earl, not believing, his being Vassal obliged him to that Condescension, furnished the King by his refusal, with the Pretence he was apparently seeking, to be revenged of the Duke another way. He sent into Bretagne an Army, to complete the Ruin of that unfortunate Prince, who was unable to resist him. England was too much concerned to support him, not to make some Effort in his favour. The Duke of Lancaster finding his Fleet ready for Sea, went on board himself, and set sail for Bretagne, where he laid Siege to St. Malo. But he met with so many Obstacles from Du Guesclin, who commanded the French Army in those Parts, that he was forced to desist from his Enterprize.

This ill Success would have perhaps discouraged the Duke of English, had not the Duke of Bretagne repaired to England, and offered to deliver to the King the Town of Breft, during the War, provided he would lend him an Aid proportioned to his Wants. So advantageous an offer inspired the King's Council with fresh hopes, since it would enable them to make from that Side a powerful Diversion, which could not but be very troublesome to France. And indeed, if the English had wisely improved their Advantages, it would have been in their power to invade France from four several Quarters, namely, Guienne, Picardy, Normandy, and Bretagne, by means of Bourdeaux, Calais, Cherbourg, and Breft, which gave the English too many Inlets into that Kingdom. Richard's Council resolving to embrace so favourable a Juncture, accepted the Duke of Bretagne's Offer, and made with him a Treaty, upon the foot proposed by himself. The Parliament, which was consulted on this Affair, approving the Council's Designs, granted a very considerable Subsidy, to execute a Project that was likely to procure great Advantages to the State. Besides the Party the Duke of Bretagne had still in his own Country, several of his Adversaries began to wish for his Restoration, not being able to bear, without extreme Uneasiness, the Infolence of the French. But as the strong holds were in the hands of the Friends of France, the faithful Subjects could undertake nothing, unless supported by the English, who were, with all possible diligence, preparing the promised Supplies.

Mean while, the King of France, who saw the gathering Storm, took measures to divert it, by procuring from the side of Scotland, a Diversion, to hinder the English from carrying their Arms abroad. The King of Scotland, gained by the Presents and Promises of the French Monarch, suddenly broke the Truce, and took Berwick Castle, by surprize (1), the Town having been dismantled in the former Wars. The Earl of Northumberland (2), Governor of the northern Counties, surprized at the loss of that Place, which was imputed to his Negligence, drew together a Body of Troops (3) with such speed, that he was at Berwick before the Scots had notice of his Design. Immediately after, he invested the Castle, and seizing a Bridge, the only Pass by which Succours could be thrown into the Place, pushed the Siege so vigorously, that in nine days he took it by Storm. Douglas (4), who was advancing to raise the Siege, finding himself disappointed, hastily retired into his Country, to avoid a Battle. He was pursued by the Earl of Northumberland, who to retard the Enemies Retreat, detached a Body of six hundred Men (5), under the Conduct of Musgrave (6), with Orders to amuse them, without engaging too far. But whilst he was himself advancing with the rest of his Army, he had Intelligence, that his Detachment was fallen into an Ambush, and entirely defeated (7). Henry Percy his Son, signalized himself, both at the Siege of Berwick, and in the late Action, and gave extraordinary Proofs of his great Courage, which gained him the surname of Hotspur. The Plague, beginning to rage in the northern Counties, obliged the two Nations to a better observance of the Truce, without a new Treaty (8).

Mean time, the Preparations for the Assistance of the Duke of Bretagne were vigorously carrying on. But as the Expence rose higher than was imagined, the Parliament (9) granted the King another Subsidy, the Burden whereof was entirely borne by the Nobility and Clergy. Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Earls, and [omitted] Abbots, were taxed at ten Marks (10) each, besides forty Pence to be paid by the Abbots for every one of their Monks, Abbride

And, as an additional Grant, they gave besides, thirteen Shillings and Four-pence for every Sack of Wool, as much for every two hundred and forty Wool-fells, and for every Last of Leather twenty six Shillings and Eight-pence. Also they gave Six-pence in the Pound for every Pound value of Merchandize, as well of Denizens as Strangers, both imported and exported for one Year. Brady's Append. l. 1. c. 12.

The rest of the Clergy and Nobility, and all that had Places, being rated according to their Incomes, the Subsidy produced very considerable Sums.

The King of France was in a great Passion with the Duke of Bretagne, for attempting to recall the English into his Country. At least, he made that a Pretence to summon him before the Court of Peers, where the Duke took care not to appear. But the Widow of Charles de Blois sent Agents to the King, to represent to him, that he had no manner of Right to confiscate Bretagne, which was not originally a Fief of the Crown of France. She maintained, if any of the former Dukes had thought proper to submit to any personal Services to the Kings of France, it was not in their Power to subject the Dukedom, without the Consent of their People. But the Court, regardless of these Remonstrances, decreed the Confiscation of Bretagne to the King's Use. This Proceeding convincing the Bretons, that Charles's Quarrel was not so much with the Duke as the Dutchy, they were afraid of falling under the Dominion of France, and seeing their Country a Province of that Kingdom. This Apprehension occasioned an Association of the great Men, which ended at length in recalling their lawful Sovereign. The Duke receiving the agreeable News, hastened his return into his Dominions, in expectation of the Succours preparing for him in England. He was received by his Subjects with great Demonstrations of Joy (1). Mean while, as the principal Places were in the hands of his Enemies, he earnestly intreated the Court of England to send him some Troops to support him, till a more powerful Supply should be ready. Upon these Instances, the Council dispatched some Ships with Troops (2). But they were for the most part lost in a violent Storm.

The Duke of Bretagne, who had quickly their Revenge, by taking several Merchant Men.

The War continued between the Duke of Bretagne and the King of England, who had quickly their Revenge, by taking several Merchant Men.

The Parliament which met in October 1380 (4), granted the King a new Aid to continue the War with France and Scotland, as well as to assist the Duke of Bretagne. This Parliament is famous for a Statute against the Blood-Suckers, who had long devoured the Land. I mean, the foreign Ecclesiastics, who by this Statute were rendered incapable of holding any Benefice in England. But as this probably would not be sufficient to curb the Court of Rome, who did not think herself bound by Acts of Parliament, another Statute was made, to render the Pope's Favours, in this respect, fruitless to Foreigners. By this Act, all the King's Subjects were forbid, on severe Penalties, to farm Benefices conferred on Strangers by the Court of Rome. This was properly attaining the same end another way. For the Pope usually giving English Benefices to his Domestic, to Italian Bishops and Cardinals, these Men could neither reside on their Benefices, nor find any Farmers in the Kingdom. At the same time, the Parliament petitioned the King to expel all foreign Monks, for fear they should give the English Impressions destructive of the Good of the State.

Foreign Monks expelled.

The Earl of Warwick, who had quickly their Revenge, by taking several Merchant Men.

Commissioners to take the King's Revenues had been put to meet under a Twelvemonth.

The Duke of Buckingham, who had quickly their Revenge, by taking several Merchant Men.

After the Parliament's Care of the Ecclesiastical Affairs, all the King's Governors were removed, as well to retrench the great Expence, as because their Number was prejudicial to his Education. Instead of these Lords, Thomas de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was chosen to have the sole care of educating the King.

Since Richard's Accession to the Throne, his Revenues had been so ill managed, that the House of Commons wanted to know on whom the blame was to be laid. To that end, fourteen Commissioners were appointed to examine to what Uses the Revenues of the Crown had been put, and to lay their Report before the next Parliament, which was not to meet under a Twelvemonth.

Shortly after, the Succours designed for the Duke of Bretagne being ready, the Command was given to the Duke of Buckingham (5) the King's Uncle. This Prince landed at Calais (6), in order to go to Bretagne by Land. Perhaps he would have found it difficult to perform his Enterprise, with an Army consisting only of eight thousand Men, had not the Duke of Burgundy, who kept close to him all the way, with much more numerous Forces, received express Orders from the King of France his Brother, not to attack the English. That Monarch had a furer way to be rid of his Enemies, namely, by a reconciliation with the Duke of Bretagne, who desired peaceably to enjoy his Dutchy, of which he saw no likelihood, as long as France was his Enemy. For this reason, the Duke of Buckingham meeting with little opposition, committed great Ravages upon his rout. Whilst he was marching, the King of France died, leaving for Successor Charles VI, his eldest Son, about twelve Years of Age. His Death might have been very advantageous to the English, if the Duke of Bretagne had firmly adhered to their Interests. But the Duke thinking it his wisest Course to take Advantage of the Confusion of the Court of France, in the beginning of a Minority, speedily concluded his late Treaty with the new King (7), who granted him whatever he could desire.

The Posture of Affairs being changed by this Agreement, the English were very coldly received in Bretagne. The Duke did not openly declare himself at first, because the English were in possession of Brecht. However, it was easy to see he had no Design to make use of them, since all the Towns denied them admittance. At length, the Duke opened his mind to the Duke of Buckingham, and making the best excuse he could, provided him with Ships to return into England (8).

The Plague which raged at the same time in England and Scotland, caused the Truce to be renewed between the two Kingdoms till the next Easter.

Though it was agreed that the Parliament should not meet under a Twelve-month, some unexpected Affairs obliged the King to assemble it in November (9), in order to demand a fresh Supply of Money which was accordingly granted, to enable him to execute the Resolutions which I shall presently speak of. But whereas the Nobility and Clergy had supplied the former Subsidy, this was levied by way of Poll-Tax, from which no Person was exempted, not even the very Monks and Nuns. All above fifteen Years old were to pay Twelve-pence a head.

One cannot but very much wonder, that whilst the Kingdom was actually engaged in a War with France and Scotland, the King's Council should think of leaving it unprovided, by sending Troops to the King of Portugal who was in War with Castile. But private Interest prevailed above that of the Publick, as is usual in the Councils of the Kings, especially during Minorities. The Motive of this Resolution, seemingly so little agreeable to the State of the Kingdom, was this. Ferdinand King of Portugal, had undertaken against John King of Castile, Son of Henry the Bastard, a War beyond his Strength. He had been so unsuccessful, that instead of making Conquests upon his Enemy, he had drawn him into his Dominions. The ill Success of this War made him court the Alliance of the English, in order to obtain Succours against the Castilians, their common Enemies. Though it was by no means proper to send Troops so far, when England could hardly defend her own Coasts, the Duke of Lancaster's Credit was so great in the Council, that it was resolved, Ferdinand should be assisted. This Resolution was coloured with the Pretence of hindering the Growth of the King of Castile, mortal Enemy of the English; but the Duke of Lancaster's private Interest was the sole Motive. This Prince, who had assumed the Title of King of Castile on account of his Marriage with Constance eldest Daughter of Peter the Cruel, hoped that by sending Troops into Portugal, they might be serviceable in promoting his own Affairs. And therefore, after the Parliament's Approbation of the intended Expedition, and Grant of a Supply to carry it on, he caused the Command of the Troops to be given to the Duke of Cambridge his Brother, designing speedily to
